NEARCHUS' VOYAGE FROM THE INDUS TO THE TIGRIS

INDEX 437

PREFACE

A KEEN critic, who pointed out several misprints in Vol. I, also took me to task for vagaries in the proper names. In these I confess to a certain licence, for which there are parallels. Sometimes "Ptolemy," sometimes "Ptolemaeus," better fits the run of the sentence, and "Ptolemaeus" is advisable where another name, such as Aristobulus, follows. In Roman Histories, despite the wise recommendations of learned societies for transliteration, "Pompey" and "Antony," undignified though they sound, are usual. In Anabasis VI. v. 5 I even venture "Craterus and Philip," since we have come to anglicise "Philippus" as a general rule.

In this volume I use Arabeans (Indica) for dwellers by the river Arabis, but keep "Agrianes" because "Agrianians" sounds ugly.

Sometimes variety is used to distinguish; it has become usual, for instance, to use Aornos of the Rock, Aornus of the Bactrian site.

A more difficult point is accentuation of rarer names, especially of Macedonian names. I print Ἀεσσήνης, as Roos did; but he repented when too late (Piget me Ἀεσσήνης . . . ex A retinuisse, cum Ἀεσσῆνος vel . . . Ἀεσσήνατος scribendum sit). Possibly in the Indica, where there is evidently some attempt at Aeolisms, we should, by βαρυτόνησις, write Ἀεσσήνατος. But -ᾶνος is probably wrong, and Hoffmann (Ueber die Makedonen u. ihre sprache) suggests that the termination is from δονιος, the name meaning "serviceable to the people" or something like, and, if so, the word should be oxytone.

Not many works on Arrian or Alexander have appeared since the publication of Vol. I, the translation of Ulrich Wilcken's Alexander and Georges Radet's Alexandre le grand (Paris, 1931, 448 pp.) are to be noted, those who have followed Radet's writings in Bordeaux University publications will know that the completed work is of high value. A copy of The Ephemerides of Alexander's Expedition, by C. A. Robinson, Jr. of Brown University, has kindly been sent me by the author, who indeed seems to attribute the work to a desire expressed in my Alexander the Great (1930). In this study of Alexander's routes and stopping places Mr. Robinson seems to reach the striking conclusion that after the death of Calanus there was for a time either a cessation of the official Diaries or much confusion in them. In this second period the surviving authorities differ much in their records of Alexander's progress. Later on they appear to have been better ordered. The writer promises a larger work.

Sir Aurel Stein prints in The Geographical Journal for July 1932 an article on "The Site of Alexander's Passage of the Hydaspes and the Battle with Poros." He has most kindly permitted use of his articles and maps, and the larger map in this volume has been so far as possible brought into harmony with his, while that of the Upper Indus is actually his.

BOOK V

1 In the country through which Alexander passed, between the rivers Cophen and Indus, was situated, they say, the city Nysa,[1] founded by Dionysus, he founded it when he subdued the Indians, whoever this Dionysus was, and whenever or whence he marched against the Indians; for I for my part cannot gather whether the Theban Dionysus started from Thebes or from the Lydian Tmolus, and led an army against the Indians, invading all these warlike peoples, unknown to the Greeks of that time, and subduing no other part of them but the Indians; still, one must not be a precise critic of ancient legends about the divine beings. For things which —if you consider them merely from their probability appear incredible, may, when one adds to one's story the divine element, prove by no means incredible.

When, however, Alexander approached Nysa, the people of Nysa sent out to him their chief, whose name was Acuphis, and with him thirty envoys from

The envoys, it is said came into Alexander's pavilion, and found him sitting all dusty still from the journey, with his ordinary armour on him, and wearing a helmet and carrying his spear, they were amazed at the sight of him, and fell to the ground, and for a long time kept silence. But when Alexander raised them up and bade them take courage, then Acuphis began and spake as follows:

"The people of Nysa, O King beg you to leave them free and independent, from reverence for Dionysus. For he, when he had subdued the nation of the Indians, and was returning towards the Greek Sea, founded, with his discharged soldiers, who were also his Bacchi,[1] this city, to be a memorial for those to come of his journey and his victory, even as you have yourself founded Alexandria by Mount Caucasus, and another Alexandria in Egypt, and you have both founded many other cities already, and will found more in course of time, thus giving proof of more achievements than those of Dionysus. Now Dionysus called this city Nysa in honour of his nurse Nysa, and the territory he called Nysaean, and the mountain near the city he named Meros (a thigh), since, according to the legend, he grew in the thigh of Zeus. From that time this city of Nysa in which we dwell has been free, and ourselves independent, and living as orderly citizens. And let this too be a proof that Dionysus was our founder: ivy grows nowhere else in this land, but does grow with us.

II. All this was very pleasing for Alexander to hear; and he was very ready to believe the tale about the journeys of Dionysus; he was ready also to credit that Nysa was founded by Dionysus, in which case he had already reached the point which Dionysus reached, and would go even farther than Dionysus. He thought also that the Macedonians would not refuse to endure toils with him still further, in rivalry with Dionysus' achievements. Alexander therefore granted continuance of freedom and independence to the settlers of Nysa. And when he had by enquiry ascertained their laws, and that their government was in the hands of the aristocrats, he expressed approval of this, at the same time demanding that they should send him three hundred horsemen, and a hundred and send a hundred of the chief men in the government; these also were three hundred in number. Acuphis was to select them, and Alexander also appointed him governor of the territory of Nysa. Then Acuphis is said to have smiled on hearing the request; and when Alexander asked why he laughed, he replied: "O King, how can a single city be deprived of a hundred good citizens and yet continue to be well governed? But if you care for the Nysaeans, let the three hundred horsemen be brought, and even more, if you wish; but instead of those hundred men, whom you desire me to choose out, the best we have, take twice the number of the inferior citizens, so that when you come hither again you may think the city to be in the same good order as now." With these words, which appeared wise words, he won Alexander's consent. He bade Acuphis send the horsemen to accompany him, but no longer to demand the select hundred, and not even to send any substitutes in their place. Acuphis sent, however, with him his son, and his daughter's son.

Alexander then was seized with a desire to see the place where the Nysaeans proudly displayed certain memorials of Dionysus, to go to Mount Merus with the Companions' cavalry and his own company of infantry, and behold the mountain full of ivy and laurel, with all sorts of groves, to see how shady it was, and that there were good hunting grounds in it of all sorts of game. The Macedonians were delighted to see the ivy, since they had seen none for a long time, for there is no ivy in the Indians country, not even where they have vines, and they eagerly made wreaths of it and crowned themselves there and then, singing hymns to Dionysus and calling on the various names of the god. Then Alexander sacrificed there to Dionysus, and made good cheer with his Companions. Some have related (if anyone can believe this story) that many of the more exalted Macedonians who were with him crowned themselves with the ivy, and were, on this invocation of the god, possessed by Dionysus, raised the Dionysiac cry, and rushed hither and thither in the Bacchic way.

III. However, these tales anyone may believe or not, just as he thinks fit. But I do not wholly agree with Eratosthenes the Cyrenaean,[1] who states that what the Macedonians say of the divine influence was much exaggerated to please Alexander. He says for instance that the Macedonians, seeing a cave among the Parapamisadae, and hearing some local legend about it, or having agreed together, spread the rumour that this was Prometheus' cave, where he had been chained, and that the eagle went there to feed on Prometheus' flesh; and that Heracles, arriving at the same spot, shot the eagle and loosed Prometheus from his chains. So the Macedonians transferred, in their account, Mount Caucasus from the Pontus to the eastern parts of the world and the country of the Parapamisadae towards India, and called Mount Paropamisus Mount Caucasus, all for the glory of Alexander, suggesting that he had actually crossed Mount Caucasus. Then in India itself, when they saw a cow branded with a club, they inferred thence that Heracles had come to India. Similar stories about Dionysus' wanderings are recorded by Eratosthenes. As far as I am concerned, the stories of these things may rest open.

Alexander, arriving at the river Indus, found a bridge already made over it by Hephaestion, and many smaller boats but also two of thirty oars. Also he found already arrived gifts from Taxiles the Indian, two hundred silver talents, and for sacrificial offerings three thousand cattle and over ten thousand sheep, with thirty elephants. There came also from Taxiles seven hundred cavalry as fighting allies, and Taxiles surrendered to him the city Taxila, the greatest city between the river Indus and the Hydaspes. There Alexander sacrificed to the gods to whom he usually offered sacrifice, and held a contest of athletics and cavalry games near the river, and the sacrifices were favourable to the crossing.

IV That the river Indus is the greatest river of Asia and Europe except the Ganges, and this too is an Indian river; and that its springs are on this side of Mount Parapamisus or Caucasus, that it runs into the great Indian sea towards the south wind, that it has two mouths and both its outlets are marshy, like the five outlets of the Ister, and that it forms a delta also in the land of India analogous to the delta in Egypt, called Pattala in the Indian language—all this about the Indus, that name by which can least be gainsaid, permit me also to set down here. For the Hydaspes, Acesines, Hydraotes, and Hyphasis,[1] all also rivers of India, are much greater than the remaining rivers of Asia, yet they are smaller, in fact much smaller, than the Indus, as the Indus itself than the Ganges. Ctesias[2] indeed—if indeed Ctesias is of any use as a witness—says that where the Indus is narrowest its banks are forty stades apart; but where it is widest even a hundred; the greater part of its course is about half-way.[1]

Across, then, the Indus Alexander crossed at dawn with his army, so entering the land of the Indians. About whom I have not in this history given any account either of their customs or whether their country breeds any strange creatures, or of the size and kind of fish or monsters which the Indus or Hydaspes, or Ganges, or the other Indian rivers produce; or of the ants which mine for gold, or of the griffins[2] which keep watch on it; or all the other romances rather written for amusement than for accurate setting out of facts; since whatever tales are told prodigiously about the Indians are not meant to be tested by anyone. In fact Alexander and his fellow-soldiers did indeed verify the greater part of these—save a few false tales such as some even of themselves made up; and they did find out that the Indians have no gold, at least those whom Alexander visited in his campaign, and they were very numerous; nor any account of luxury in their manner of living; but they are tall of stature, in fact the tallest men in Asia, most of them five cubits or very little short of it; and they are darker-skinned than the rest of mankind except the Ethiopians, and in warlike matters much the bravest of the inhabitants of Asia at that time. For I cannot properly compare with the Indians the ancient Persians with whom Cyrus son of Cambyses set forth and deprived the Medes of the sovereignty of Asia, and subdued some of the remaining peoples, and received the voluntary surrender of the rest. For the Persians then were poor, and dwelt in a rough country, and their customs were apparently related as near as possible to the Spartan educational system. Nor can I properly compare the disaster dealt to the Persians in Scythian territory, whether it happened because they fell in with difficulties of the region, or by some other error of Cyrus, or whether the Persians were actually inferior in warfare to the Scythians of this region.

5. However, about India I shall write a special monograph[1] based on all the most trustworthy facts from Alexander's fellow campaigners and Nearchus, who coasted along the part of the Great Sea which lies towards India, adding besides all that Megasthenes and Eratosthenes, who are both men of repute, have written, the customs of India, any strange beasts which are there, and the voyage round it by the Outer Sea. But now let what I have written down suffice, so far as seemed necessary to the account of Alexander's achievements: namely, that Mount Taurus is the boundary of Asia, beginning from Mycale, the mountain over against the island of Samos; then cutting through between the land of Pamphylia and Cilicia, thence reaches to Armenia; and from Armenia runs to Media by way of the Parthyaeans and Chorasmians; and in Bactria joins Mount Parapamisus, which the Macedonians who served with Alexander called Mount Caucasus, with a view, so it is said, of glorifying Alexander, as suggesting that Alexander reached even the farther side of Mount Caucasus in his victorious career. Perhaps, however, this mountain is continuous with the other Caucasus, that is, the Scythian; just as Mount Taurus is continuous with this Caucasus. For this reason I have previously called this mountain Caucasus, and shall continue so to call it later This Caucasus reaches to the great eastern sea, towards India. Thus all the important rivers of Asia rise from Mounts Taurus and Caucasus; and a part of them turn their streams northward, and of them some pass out into Lake Maeotis; others into the sea called the Hyrcanian, itself a gulf of the Great Sea, a part again turn southward, the Euphrates, Tigris, Indus, Hydaspes, Acesines, Hydraotis, and Hyphasis, and any which are between these and the Ganges and run out into the sea or are diffused over marshy ground and so disappear, as the Euphrates disappears.

VI. Anyone who surveys Asia so that it is divided by Mounts Taurus and Caucasus from west to east will find that the two greatest divisions of Asia are formed by Mount Taurus itself, the one looking towards the south and the south wind, the other to the north and the north wind. Then the southern part of Asia may again be divided into four parts, and of these Eratosthenes and Megasthenes regard as the greatest part the region of India—Megasthenes dwelt with the satrap of Arachosia Sibyrtius, and writes that he often visited Sandracottus,[1] the king of the Indians, the smallest part, that bounded by the Euphrates, looks towards our inland sea. The other two parts lie between the Euphrates and the Indus, and these two put together can hardly be compared with the territory of India. India itself both east and west, right down to the south, is bounded by the Great Sea, its northern part is bounded by Mount Caucasus till its junction with Mount Taurus; then to the west, and the north-west wind, as far as the Great Sea, the Indus forms its boundary. The greater part of it is level plain, and thus, as is conjectured, is alluvial, formed by the rivers. In other parts of the country also such plains as are near the sea for the most part are the result each of its neighbouring river; so too the name of the country from ancient times was attached to the rivers. Thus there is a plain of Hermus, which river rises in Asia from the mountain of Mother Dindymene and runs into the sea near the city of Smyrna in Aeolia, then there is another plain, that of Cayster, a Lydian plain and named from a Lydian river, another plain of Caicus, in Mysia, and the Caïan plain of Maeander, stretching to Miletus, the Ionian city. Egypt also the historians Herodotus[2] and Hecataeus, though possibly the work on Egypt is by another than Hecataeus both call similarly "the gift of the river," and Herodotus has shown by very clear proofs that this is so owing to the coincidence of country and river sharing the same name. For that Aegyptus was the old name of the river which the Egyptians and others bring outside Egypt as far as the Nile Homer is ample evidence, when he says that Menelaus stationed his ships at the mouth of the river Aegyptus. Since therefore, any one river, each in various parts of the world and not great rivers either, can while flowing seaward build up a great stretch of land by bringing down mud and deposits from the upper lands where are their springs, there is no reason for disbelief about the country of India either how it comes to be for the most part plain, and has its plain formed by the alluvial deposits of the rivers as for Hermus and Caystrus and Caicus and Maeander or any other rivers of Asia which run out into this inner sea, if you put them all together you could not for volume of water, compare them with one of the rivers of India – to say nothing of the largest, Ganges, with which not even the volume of the Nile in Egypt nor the Ister[1] which flows through Europe is worthy to be compared nay, not even if all were put together do they equal the river Indus, which rises a great river at its very springs, and takes in fifteen tributaries, all greater than the Asian rivers, and, imposing its name as it goes, runs out to join the sea. This for the present must be all I have to say about India, the rest must be put aside for my Indian History.

VII As for the method by which Alexander bridged the Indus, neither Aristobulus nor Ptolemaeus, the authors whom I chiefly follow, describe it, nor can I myself make a reasonable conjecture, whether the passage was bridged by boats,[1] as the Hellespont by Xerxes and the Bosporus and Ister by Darius,[2] or whether a continuous bridge was built across the stream I am inclined to the idea that the bridging was by boats, since the depth of the river would not admit of a bridge, nor could so extraordinary a work have been completed in so little time Again if the stream was bridged with boats, whether the boats were lashed together by ropes and then moored in order and so formed the bridge, as Herodotus of Halicarnassus says that the Hellespont was bridged, or in the way in which the Roman bridge is made on the Ister and on the Celtic Rhine, and in which they bridged the Euphrates and Tigris, as often as they were obliged to do so this too I cannot say Yet the quickest way of bridging I know is the Roman by use of boats, and I shall here describe it, for it merits description. The boats are, at the given signal, allowed to float down-stream, yet not bows on, but as if backing So then the stream, as is natural, carries them down, but a rowing boat holds them up till it manœuvres them into the appointed place Then wicker crates made pyramidshape full of unhewn stones are let down from the bows of each ship to hold it against the stream. And when one ship is thus made fast, and then another, just at the right interval to carry the superstructure safely, it is anchored head up-stream; and on both boats timbers are accurately and smartly laid,[1] and planks crosswise to bind them together. Then the work goes on throughout all the boats, so many as are needed for the bridging. On either side of the bridge ladders[2] are thrown out, and made fast, so that the passage may be safer for horses and baggage animals, and also to bind the bridge together; and in quite a short time, and with much bustle, the whole work is completed; and yet there is good order in the course of the work; instructions called from ship to ship, and reproofs of shirked work, do not spoil the hearing of the orders, nor the speed of the operation.

VIII. These then are the long-established methods of the Romans; but how Alexander bridged the Indus I do not pretend to say, for even those who served under him did not tell us. Still, I am inclined to think that he approximated to this way of bridging; yet if it was by some other means, let it pass. After taking his army across, Alexander sacrificed according to custom. Then leaving the Indus he marched to Taxila, a great and prosperous city. It is indeed the largest of all which lie between the river Indus and the Hydaspes. He was received there by Taxiles, the governor of the city, and the Indians of this district, in a friendly manner, and Alexander added to them so much of the neighbouring territory as they requested. Here then joined him envoys from Abisares, the king of the Indian hill tribes, and the brother of Abisares and others with him, the most notable men, others also from Doxares the governor of the district, bringing gifts. There also, at Taxila, Alexander offered the customary sacrifices and held an athletic and cavalry contest. He appointed Philip son of Machatas satrap of the Indians of this territory, and left behind a garrison and any invalided soldiers he had, then he marched on towards the river Hydaspes.

For he had learnt that Porus was on the far side of the Hydaspes with all his army, determined to prevent his crossing or at least to attack him should he attempt it. On learning this, Alexander sent Coenus son of Polemocrates back to the river Indus, ordering him to take to pieces the boats that had been got ready at the crossing of the Indus and bring them to the Hydaspes. The boats were duly dismembered and transported, the shorter ones in two sections, but the thirty-oar ships cut into three and the sections were brought in carts to the bank of the Hydaspes. There the flotilla was put together again, and again seen in full force, now on the Hydaspes. Then Alexander taking the force with which he arrived at Taxila and also five thousand Indians, led by Taxiles and the governors of the district, marched to the Hydaspes.

pitched his camp; and Porus was observed on the opposite bank with all his forces and with his squadron of elephants. Where Porus observed that Alexander had encamped, he guarded the crossing himself; but at the other parts of the river where a crossing was possible he posted guards, appointing commanders to each guard, and determined to keep the Macedonians from attempting to cross. Alexander, observing this, thought it well to move his army about in different directions so as to keep Porus in uncertainty. He therefore broke up his army into several detachments, and some he led hither and thither over the country, partly destroying any enemy possessions, and partly reconnoitring for good places for crossing the river; other troops he allotted to different commanders, and often sent them out in different directions. Supplies came into his camp from every direction of the country this side of the Hydaspes, so that it was evident to Porus that he had determined to keep to the bank until the water of the river falling during the winter gave him a chance of crossing the river at various points. His boats plying up and down the river, and that the boats and the rafts made of skins being filled with the chaff,[1] and the bank lined with troops, horsemen and infantry, gave Porus no chance of rest, nor permitted him to choose one position most suitable for guarding and concentrate upon this. Then besides, at that time all the rivers of India were running with a big and turbulent stream and with a swift current; for it was the season when the sun is just turning its head towards the summer turning;[1] and at this season heavy rains come down on the land of India and the snows of the Caucasus, whence spring most of the rivers, are melting and greatly increase the volume of water; but in winter the rivers stop again, become smaller and clear in appearance, and fordable in places, except the Indus and Ganges and possibly another; the Hydaspes at any rate becomes fordable.

X. For this summer season, then, Alexander openly announced that he would wait, if he were prevented from crossing at the time; but none the less he stayed there watching if he anyhow might, without being seen, make a swift dash and effect the crossing. Where Porus himself had encamped on the bank of the Hydaspes he recognized that it was impossible to cross, both owing to the number of the elephants and because there was a great army, well ordered and carefully armed, ready to attack his troops as they landed. Then he thought that the horses would not be willing even to set foot on the other side, as the elephants would immediately advance to attack them, and scare them both by their appearance and their trumpeting; nay, further, they would not even stay on the rafts made of skins during the transit, but would at once jump off into the water if they caught sight of the elephants from afar and became terrified. So he determined to make a secret crossing in this way. At night he took the greater part of his cavalry in this and that direction along the bank, and made much noise and raised the Greek war cry, and in all other ways every sort of disturbance was made which was likely when an army was preparing to cross. Porus then kept moving parallel with the noise, bringing up his elephants, and Alexander led him on to make a habit of this counter-movement. But when this had gone on some time, and there was nothing but shouting and raising of the war-cry, Porus no longer kept moving about towards the cavalry dashes, but realising that the alarm was false remained in camp where he was, though he had set scouts at various points of the bank. But Alexander, when he had examined Porus' nervousness towards these nightly attempts, contrived the following device.

XI From the bank of the Hydaspes projected a headland where the river made a considerable bend, it was thick with every sort of tree, and opposite it was an island in the river, wooded and desolate, untrodden as it was by foot of man. Observing this island opposite the headland, both being well wooded, and suited to hide the attempt at crossing, Alexander determined to take his army over at this point. The headland and island were about a hundred and fifty stades distant from the great camp. Alexander had posted guards all along the bank, at distances from which it was possible to see one another and to hear easily from whatever point any order was passed on, and from all sides cries at night were raised, over several nights, and fires kept burning.

But when Alexander had determined to attempt the passage, preparations for crossing were made openly in the camp, and Craterus was left in charge of the camp, with his own cavalry regiment and the cavalry of the Arachotians and of the Parapamisadae, and of the Macedonian phalanx, the brigade of Alcetas and Polyperchon, and the governors of the Indians of these districts, and those with them, the five thousand Indians. Craterus was ordered not to attempt a crossing till Porus and his army had left his camp to attack Alexander's forces, or till he had learnt that Porus was in flight, and the Greeks conquerors; "but should Porus take a part of his army and lead it against me" (Alexander continued) "and another part be left behind at his camp, and any elephants, do you still stay where you are; if, however, Porus leads all his elephants against me, but some portion of the army is left behind at the camp, then do you cross with all dispatch; for it is only the elephants which are dangerous to disembarking horses; the rest of the force will not trouble them."

XII Such were Craterus' orders, but between the island and the great camp, where Craterus had been left, Meleager and Attalus and Gorgias were posted with the mercenary cavalry and infantry; and they too had been ordered to make a crossing in sections, dividing the force, so soon as they should see the Indians already entangled in the battle.

Alexander himself selected the special squadron of the Companions, and the cavalry regiment of Hephaestion, and of Perdiccas and Demetrius, and the cavalry from Bactria and Sogdiana and the Scythian horsemen, with the Dahae, mounted archers, and of the phalanx, the bodyguard, and the brigade of Coenus and Coenus the archers and the Agrianes, he led this force secretly, keeping some distance from the bank, so that he might not be seen marching towards the island and the rock where he had determined to cross. And there during the night, the rafts made of hides, which had already some time before been brought along, were filled with chaff, and were carefully sewn together, and there fell a very violent rain during the night. So Alexander's preparations and his attempt to make the crossing were as the more concealed, the thunder-claps and the rain counteracted the clatter of the arms and the confusion arising from the commands; and most of the boats, which had been broken into sections, had been transported to this place and being put together again, out of sight were hidden in the wood, the thirty oar-ships with the rest. But towards dawn the wind and the rain had quieted down, and the cavalry had embarked on the rafts, and all the infantry which the boats could take, crossed by the island, so that they might not be seen by the scouts which Porus had posted before they had passed the island and were already near the bank.

XIII. Alexander then himself embarked on a thirty-oared boat and began the passage, and with him were Ptolemaeus and Perdiccas and Lysimachus, the officers of his bodyguard, and Seleucus, one of the Companions, who afterwards became king, and half of the bodyguard too. The rest of these were taken by other thirty-oar boats. And when the force passed the island they were now in full sight, as they approached the bank, and the scouts, observing their oncoming with all the speed of their horses rode off to Porus. Meanwhile Alexander disembarked first himself, and then took over those from the other thirty-four boats, and as the cavalry kept disembarking he marshalled them in order, for he had instructed the cavalry to disembark first and then taking these with him he advanced in fighting array. However without being aware, he had disembarked from want of local knowledge, not on the mainland but on an island a large one, it is true, and this was chiefly why he did not discover it was an island, but yet it was parted from the other side by the river with no very great stream. At the same time the rain which was violent and kept on all night had swollen the river, so that the mounted men did not find the ford, and there was some apprehension that to complete the crossing he must repeat all the former labour. But when at last the ford was found, Alexander led on though with difficulty across it. For the water, at its shallowest, was over the breasts of the foot soldiers, so deep that the horses only kept their heads above the river. But when this part also of the river was successfully passed he led round to his right wing the picked squadron of the cavalry, selecting the best of the other cavalry regiments, the mounted archers he set in front of the whole line of cavalry, then next to the cavalry he marshalled, of the infantry, the royal guards under Seleucus, then next to them the royal regiment, and in touch with these the rest of the foot guards, according as each had precedence for that day; on the wings of the phalanx on either side he stationed the archers and the Agrianes and the javelin-throwers.

XIV With his army therefore thus marshalled, Alexander ordered the infantry forces to follow at a foot pace and in marching formation their number being nearly six thousand Then he himself as he seemed to be superior in the cavalry took the cavalry only and advanced at an easy speed the cavalry numbering about five thousand He directed, however, Taurôn the commander of the archers to lead them also on with the cavalry and now at full speed. And he had determined that should Porus and his detachment attack him with their full force, either he would easily overcome them with his cavalry, by charging them or he would fight on the defensive until infantry should get into action If however, the Indians in face of the extraordinary boldness of the crossing should take to flight, he would be close up to them during the flight and the greater the slaughter during the withdrawal the less trouble there would be for him in the future

Aristobulus, however says that Porus' son arrived with sixty chariots before Alexander took across from the small island the latter part of his troops and that he could indeed have prevented Alexander's crossing, since he got over with much difficulty even when no one opposed him if only the Indians had leapt from their chariots and attacked the foremost of those coming to land In point of fact however, he drove past with his chariots and thus allowed Alexander to cross without risk, and Alexander launched against this force his mounted archers, and with no great difficulty turned them to flight, many being wounded. Others say that there was actually a battle at the landing, of Porus' son and the force which came with him, against Alexander and his cavalry. For Porus' son actually did arrive (they say) with a superior force, and Alexander was wounded by him and his horse Bucephalas killed, his favourite horse, and wounded, moreover, by Porus' son. But Ptolemaeus son of Lagus, with whom I agree, gives a different account. For he too states that Porus sent his son, but not with only sixty chariots. For it is not likely that Porus, learning from his scouts that either Alexander had himself forded the Hydaspes or a part of his army, would have sent out his own son with merely sixty chariots. If these were sent merely for reconnaissance, they were too many; they were not handy for a withdrawal, if they were sent to keep an enemy, which had not yet crossed, from doing so, and to fight with such as had crossed, they were by no means equal to the task. He relates, on the other hand, that Porus' son had two thousand cavalry with him, when he reached the place, and a hundred and twenty chariots, but that Alexander was too quick and had by then passed even the last crossing from the island.

XV It is Ptolemaeus also who narrates that Alexander at first sent against Porus' son and his force the mounted archers, but that he himself led on the cavalry, expecting that Porus was coming up with all his army, and that this cavalry, marshalled by him in the van, preceded the rest of the Greek troops. But on learning accurately the number of the Indians from his scouts, he fell upon them sharply with the cavalry he had with him; they gave way when they perceived Alexander himself and the serried mass of cavalry round him, attacking not on a front but squadron by squadron. Of the Indians there fell as many as four hundred horsemen, and Porus' son also fell; and the chariots, with their teams, were captured in the retreat, driving heavily and useless in the action itself because of the mud.

Porus, however, so soon as the cavalry which escaped in the flight reported to him that Alexander himself had crossed with his army in full force, and that his son had fallen in the fight, was in two minds from this additional reason, that those in the camp opposite, who had been left behind with Craterus, were now seen attempting the passage. He chose, in any case, to advance towards Alexander himself with all his force, and fight to a finish against the strongest part of the Macedonians and their King himself. Yet none the less he left behind a few of the elephants and a small force by his camp, to scare away the cavalry under Craterus from the bank. Then taking all his cavalry, about four thousand horse, and all the chariots, some three hundred, and two hundred of the elephants, and the best of the infantry, about thirty thousand, he advanced against Alexander. And reaching a place which was not muddy, but being sandy was all level and solid for charges and manœuvres of cavalry, he drew up his army in this way First the elephants on the front, distant each from each about a hundred feet, so that they should form a line in front of the whole infantry line, and at all points terrify the cavalry of Alexander For in any case he did not expect that any of the enemy would dare to force a way through the gaps between the elephants, certainly not on horseback, since the horses would take fright, and still less foot soldiers, who would be kept back by the heavy armed troops advancing in line and then would be trampled down by the elephants turning upon them Behind these elephants were stationed the foot-soldiers, not on the same front as the elephants but holding the second line after them so that the columns were fitted, more or less, into the intervals left by the animals Porus had besides stationed on the wings foot-soldiers, stretching even beyond the line of elephants Then on each flank of the infantry the cavalry was posted, and in front of the cavalry the chariots, on both sides

XVI This then was the disposition of Porus. But Alexander, seeing the Indians already getting into battle array halted his cavalry from any further advance, so as to await the infantry as they came up behind And when the phalanx coming on at a rapid pace, had joined the advance forces Alexander did not at once put them in battle order and lead them forward, so as not to confront them while tired and out of breath with the enemy who were fresh, but moving his cavalry round rested his infantry till they had recovered their fighting spirit On sighting the Indian disposition, however he decided not to advance by the centre, where the advance line of elephants had been thrown forward, and where the phalanx, in close formation, was posted in the intervals between them, hesitating just for those very reasons which Porus had foreseen when making this disposition, but since his own superiority lay in cavalry, he took with him the majority of his cavalry and rode up to the enemy's left wing intending to make his attack there. Coenus he sent to the right, with the regiments of Demetrius and his own, he commanded him that so soon as the Indians should perceive the solid body of cavalry and advance their cavalry to meet it, he should keep behind them. Seleucus and Antigenes and Tauron Alexander commanded to lead the infantry phalanx, but they were not to take part in the action till they observed the enemy's main body of infantry and their cavalry thrown into confusion by his own cavalry force.

By now they were within range, and Alexander launched his mounted archers about a thousand strong at the Indians' left wing, to throw into confusion those of the enemy who were stationed there both by the severity of the volleys of arrows and the charge of the cavalry. Then he himself with the Companions' cavalry rode rapidly against the enemy left hastening to charge them, in their confusion, while they were still in line formation, before their cavalry could change into massed formation.

XVII. Meantime the Indians, concentrating all their cavalry from every quarter, kept riding parallel to Alexander, on the flank of their own line, to oppose his charge, and Coenus and his troops, according to orders, began to appear in their rear. Seeing this the Indians were compelled to throw their cavalry into a double formation, one division, the more numerous and strongest, facing Alexander, the other wheeled round to meet Coenus and his force. This of course at once upset both the formations and the intentions of the Indians, and Alexander, perceiving the opportunity, precisely during this about turn of the cavalry attacked the troops on his front, so that the Indians did not even wait to receive the charge of Alexander's cavalry, but fell hurriedly back upon their elephants, as if to some friendly sheltering wall. Meanwhile the drivers of the elephants brought up their animals against Alexander's cavalry, and the Macedonian phalanx for its part boldly advanced to meet the elephants, hurling javelins at their drivers, and, forming a ring round the animals, vo leyed upon them from all sides. And the action was now without parallel in any previous battle, for the elephants, charging out into the line of infantry, whichever way they turned, began to devastate it, dense though the Macedonian phalanx was, and the Indian cavalry, seeing the action had settled down to an infantry battle wheeled off again and themselves charged the Macedonian cavalry. But when a second time Alexander's forces had the mastery over them, much superior, as they were, both in strength and experience, they fell back again on the elephants. Meanwhile al Alexander's cavalry having become concentrated into one body—not by order, but forced into this concentration in the course of the battle itself—wherever it fell upon the Indian ranks, inflicted much slaughter before it withdrew. And by this time the elephants were crowded into a narrow space, and their own side were as much damaged by them as the enemy, trodden down in their manœuvrings and their chargings. The Indian cavalry therefore, which was cramped round the elephants in a narrow space suffered much loss, and the most part of the drivers of the elephants had been shot down, and of the elephants some had been wounded, and others from weariness and loss of drivers, no longer kept apart in the melée, but as if maddened by the disaster they kept striding with friends and foes alike and in all sorts of ways kept pushing, trampling, and destroying. The Macedonians however having good room and able to attack the animals according to their own discretion gave way wherever they charged but followed close as they withdrew and kept shooting at them with javelins. The Indians on the other hand were retreating among the elephants and already were receiving the greater part of their damage from them. But when the elephants wearied and their charges were no longer vigorous but merely trumpeting began to retreat gradually like ships backing, Alexander himself threw his cavalry in a circle around their whole flank and then gave signals for the infantry locking shields and concentrating into the most compact mass possible to move up in full phalanx. So it was that the Indian cavalry, save only a few were all cut down in the action but their infantry also was being cut down on all sides, as the Macedonians by this time were pressing hard upon them. And now, where there was a gap in Alexander's cavalry, they all turned and fled.

a conspicuous victory, themselves began to cross the river, and these wrought equal slaughter in the Indian retreat, coming into the pursuit fresh, in place of Alexander's wearied troops.

Of the Indians there perished nearly twenty thousand foot and horsemen about three thousand, all the chariots were destroyed, two sons of Porus perished, and Spitaces, the governor of the Indians of this district with the commanders of the elephants and the chariots and all the cavalry commanders and other commanding officers of Porus' army, and all the surviving elephants were captured. But of Alexander's army fell soldiers of the number of about eighty perished, out of a force which had been six thousand strong in the first attack; as for the cavalry, ten of the mounted archers, who were the first to begin the action, and of the Companions' cavalry about twenty, with two hundred of the rest of the cavalry.

Porus had acquitted himself manfully in the course of the engagement, not only as a commander-in-chief but also as a brave soldier, but when he saw the slaughter of his cavalry and of the elephants, some fallen on the field and some wandering in distress, having cast their riders, and when most of his strength had perished he did not copy the example of the great king Darius, and set his own men an example of flight; but so long as any part of the Indian troops held their ground in the fight so long he battled on bravely, but when wounded in the right shoulder, the only unprotected part of his body as he moved about in the battle, for his corslet guarded the rest of his body from the missiles, being unusually strong and unusually well fitted, as those who saw afterwards could observe—on receiving this wound he wheeled his elephant and retreated. Alexander having seen him play a great and gallant part in the battle desired to save him. He sent therefore to him first Taxiles the Indian, and Taxiles, riding up as near as he thought safe to the elephant on which Porus was riding, requested him to halt his animal, since further flight was unavailing, and to hear what Alexander's message was. But Porus seeing in Taxiles an old enemy turned his elephant and rode up to pierce him with a javelin, and indeed he might perchance have slain him, had not Taxiles, just in time, wheeled his horse further away from Porus. Alexander, however, did not even on this show anger against Porus, but sent others, in relays, and finally an Indian, Meroes, having learnt that this Meroes had long been a friend of Porus. But Porus, hearing Meroes' message, and being also much distressed by thirst, halted his elephant and dismounted, and after drinking, and recovering his strength, bade Meroes conduct him at once to Alexander.

XIX. Porus was then conducted to Alexander, who learning of his approach rode and met him in advance of the line with a few of the Companions, then halting his horse, he admired the great size of Porus, who was over five cubits in height, and his handsomeness, and the appearance he gave of a spirit not yet tamed, but of one brave man meeting another brave man after an honourable struggle against another king for his kingdom. Then Alexander first addressing him bade him say what he desired to be done with him. Porus is said to have replied Treat me, Alexander, I am asking. And Alexander, pleased with the reply, answered: If that be my desire, Porus, for my part ask what you desire. He replied that everything was contained in that one request. Alexander then, and the more pleased with this reply, gave back to Porus his sovereignty over the Indians of his realm, and added another besides his former territory even greater in extent: this did he treat as a thing a brave man and from them he found him in all things faithful. Porus was the name of the battle of Alexander against Porus and he Indians on the far side of the Hydaspes, in the archonship at Athens of Hegemon and in the month Munychion.

In the place where the battle was fought and from which he set out to cross the Hydaspes, Alexander founded cities. The first he called Victory,[1] from the victory over the Indians; the other Bucephala,[2] in memory of his horse Bucephalas which [illegible] was not worsted by any war but from exhaustion and age. For he was already thirty years old and was a victim to fatigue; but up to then he had shared Alexander's toils and dangers in pretty nearly innumerable wars; but Alexander himself, since Bucephalas would be seen no other ruler in stature he was tall and in spirit courageous. His mark was an ox-head branded upon him and hence his name Bucephalas, others however say that he had a white mark on his head—the rest being black which was exactly like an ox head. In the Uxian territory Alexander once lost him, and issued a proclamation throughout that territory that he would massacre every Uxian unless they brought him back his horse, immediately after the proclamation Bucephalas was restored to him. Such was Alexander's devotion to him, and such was the terror Alexander inspired in the natives. And now I must cease my panegyric on Bucephalas, which I make for Alexander's sake.

XX As soon as the due tributes of respect had been paid to those who fell in the battle, Alexander sacrificed to the gods the customary thanksgivings of victory, and held a contest of athletics and cavalry games on the bank of the Hydaspes where he first crossed with his army. Craterus, with part of the forces, he left behind to build and fortify the cities he was founding here. Then he himself advanced towards the Indians who bordered on Porus' kingdom. The name of the tribe was Gandaridae, as Aristobulus says, but Ptolemy calls them Gandae. I do not trouble myself which was the exact form of the name. Alexander invaded their country, with half of the Companions' cavalry, and picked men of the infantry from each phalanx, all the mounted archers, the Agrianes, and the unmounted archers, and the tribesmen all made their surrender to him. So he captured thirty-seven cities, of these, the least populated had above five thousand inhabitants, many of them had over ten thousand. He captured also a large number of villages, not less populous than their cities. He gave the rule of this territory to Porus; Porus also he reconciled to Taxiles, and then dismissed Taxiles back to his own tribes.

Meanwhile envoys came from Abisares, offering to Alexander surrender of Abisares himself and the country over which he ruled. And yet before the battle with Porus, Abisares had the intention of ranging himself on Porus side But now he sent his own brother with the other envoys to Alexander, bringing treasure, and forty elephants, as a gift to Alexander There came also to Alexander envoys from the self-governing Indians, and from a governor of certain Indians, also called Porus. Alexander on this quickly sent a message to Abisares bidding him come to him, threatening, if he should not come, that Abisares should behold him come with his army, and would have cause to rue the sight.

In the meantime Phrataphernes the satrap of Parthyaea and Hyrcania came to Alexander, bringing the Thracians left behind with him, there came also messengers from Sisicottus satrap of the Assacenians, to say that the Assacenians had assassinated their governor and had broken away from Alexander Against these Alexander sent Philippus and Tyriaspes with an army to subdue the territory of the Assacenians and bring it into order.

Then he himself moved towards the river Acesines. Of this river Acesines only, among the rivers of India, Ptolemaeus son of Lagus has described the size; its stream, he says, at the point where Alexander crossed it with his army, on the boats and hides, is very swift, with great and sharp rocks, the water rushes down over these, foaming and roaring: the breadth is fifteen stades. For those who crossed on the hides, he says, the crossing was easy, but a good number of those who made the transit in the boats were lost in the stream, since several boats were dashed upon the rocks and so were wrecked. From this account one may conjecture that writers are not far from the truth who have given the size of the river Indus as forty stades in breadth at its mean width; but that where it is narrowest, and for that reason deepest, it shrinks to some fifteen stades, and that this is in many places its breadth. Further, I gather that Alexander chose the widest part of the river Acesines to cross, that he might have the current slower

XXI When therefore he had crossed the river, Alexander left Coenus with his brigade on the bank bidding him supervise the crossing of the remainder of the army, for they were to convoy thither the corn from the part of India already subject to him, and all other necessaries. Porus he sent back to his own kingdom, with orders that he should select the most warlike of the Indians, and any elephants he had with him, and bring these to join him. Then Alexander purposed to pursue with the lightest of his troops the other Porus, the bad one, because he was reported to have left his own province and fled. For this Porus, as long as Alexander's relations had remained unfriendly towards the first Porus, had sent envoys to Alexander, offering surrender of himself and his province, rather from hatred of the other Porus than from any friendly feelings towards Alexander, but learning that he had been released, and was now ruler of a considerable new province, besides his own, he became alarmed, not so much about Alexander as about his namesake, and fled from his country, taking with him so many of the warlike tribesmen as he could persuade to share his flight.

In pursuit of him Alexander arrived at the river Hydraotes, another Indian river, in breadth not less than the Acesines, but inferior in swiftness of current. In all the country which he had traversed, as far as the Hydraotes, he left guards in the most convenient spots, so that the troops with Craterus and Coenus might with safety traverse the greater part of the country in their search for provision. Here he despatched Hephaestion, giving him part of the army, two phalanxes of foot-soldiers, and of cavalry, his own regiment, and that of Demetrius, and half the archers, to the province of the rebellious Porus, bidding him hand this province to the other Porus, together with any other independent Indian tribes dwelling along the banks of the Hydaspes, these too he was to take over, and give them to Porus to govern. Then he himself crossed the Hydraotes, met with the difficulties which the Assenian had caused. Then as he continued on the farther bank of the Hydraotes most of the tribesmen came and surrendered to unitary some in fact who had actually come to meet him under arms. Others again he captured when attempting flight, and subdued them by force.

XXII Meanwhile it was reported to Alexander that some of the self governing Indians, in particular the people called Cathaeans, were getting themselves ready for battle, in case Alexander should approach their country and were urging to the same enterprise all other self governing tribes on their borders. Their city it was said, was a very strong one and there they proposed to make their stand. Its name was Sangala[1] and the Cathaeans themselves were considered very brave and very powerful in war. In the same mood with them were the Oxydracae, another Indian tribe, and Malians, another, not long before in fact Porus and Abisares had marched against them with their force and had also stirred up many other self-governing Indian tribes against them but they had achieved nothing commensurate with so great a host and so had retreated.

When this was reported to Alexander he marched at full speed against the Cathaeans. In two days after leaving the river Hydraotes he came to a city named Pimprama, this tribe of Indians is called the Adrastae. They surrendered by agreement to Alexander. The next day Alexander rested his troops, and on the third marched towards Sangala, where the Cathaeans and their neighbours who had joined them were arrayed in front of the city on a hill not equally steep on all sides; round about the hill they had arranged their waggons and were camping within them; thus the waggons formed a triple line of defence.

But Alexander, perceiving the large number of the tribesmen and the nature of the place, made his counter dispositions as seemed best for the exigencies of the moment, the mounted archers without delay he despatched against them, with orders to keep riding along the front and shoot at long range, so that the Indians should not make any sally before he had marshalled his forces and that they might already be wounded even within their stronghold, before the battle began. He himself on the right wing posted the special squadron of cavalry and Cleitus Horse, next to them, his bodyguard, and then the Agrianes; Perdiccas was posted on his left with his own Horse and the brigades of the Companions infantry. On either wing he had stationed the archers, equally divided.

Now while Alexander was thus arranging his troops there came up the infantry and cavalry of the rearguard. Of these, he divided up the cavalry and sent them off to either wing, and by means of the infantry who thus joined him he increased the solidity of his phalanx. Then himself taking the cavalry posted on the right he led them against the waggons on the Indians' left. For the ground on this side seemed easier, and the waggons were not packed so closely.

XVIII. Since, however, the Indians did not sally out from the line of waggons upon the cavalry as it rode up but mounted on them instead and shot volleys of arrows from them, Alexander, recognizing that the action was not work for cavalry, leapt down from his horse and on foot led the attack the phalanx of foot soldiers. From the first line of waggons the Macedonians easily forced the Indians, but before the second one the Indians drew themselves up in order and with less difficulty defended themselves, since they were in denser formation in a smaller circle, and the Macedonians could not approach them, as before, through an open space, while they were removing the first row of waggons and then charging in without order through the spaces between, just as each man made his way. Yet even from this second one the Indians were forced back by the phalanx. And now they no longer attempted to make a stand at the third line of waggons, but with all speed retreated and shut themselves into the city. For that day, then, Alexander camped with his infantry round the city, so far at least as the phalanx could surround, for since the wall stretched a considerable distance he could not entirely surround it with his troops while encamped, but in the intervals, where there was a lake also not far from the wall, he posted his cavalry surrounding the lake, as he noticed that the lake was shallow and also conjectured that the Indians, terrified from the previous defeat, would desert the city at night. It fell out exactly as he conjectured, about the second watch, sure enough, the greater part of them slipped out from the wall and fell in with the cavalry outposts, the first-comers were cut down by the cavalry, the next perceiving that the lake was guarded all round, retired again into the city.

Alexander, however threw a double stockade all round, where the lake did not guard the city, and posted his outposts round about the lake more carefully. Then he himself proposed to bring up engines against the wall, to batter it. But some of the inhabitants of the city deserted to him, and these told him that the Indians proposed to slip out of the city that night by the lake, just where there was the gap in the stockade. Then he posted there Ptolemaeus son of Lagus, giving him three regiments of the bodyguards, all the Agrianes, and one brigade of archers, and pointing out the place where he most conjectured that the tribesmen would try to force their way, "so soon," he said, "as you perceive them to be trying to force a way through here, you yourself will, with your army, prevent their going farther, and will at once bid the bugler to sound an alarm, and you, officers, on the signal, will each with his appointed forces make for the disturbance wherever the bugle calls you. Not shall I myself be a laggard in this action."

XXIV. Such were Alexander's orders, and Ptolemaeus, gathering together as many as possible of the waggons left behind in the first flight, set them crosswise, that the fugitives at night might find a good many obstacles; moreover, he ordered any part of the stockade which had been cut but not yet fixed down to be joined up at different points between the lake and the wall. This his men completed by night. It was now about the fourth watch, and the tribesmen, as Alexander had been informed, opened the gates leading to the lake and ran towards it. Yet they did not escape the guards on this side, nor yet Ptolemaeus, who was posted in charge of them, but at once his buglers sounded the alarm, and he with his forces fully armed and in good order moved against the tribesmen. These found their way barred by the waggons, and the stockade thrown in the intervening space. And when the bugle sounded and Ptolemaeus and his troops pressed hard upon them, cutting them down as fast as they tried to slip out between the waggons, they turned and fled back to the city. Some five hundred perished in this withdrawal.

Meanwhile Porus arrived, bringing with him the rest of the elephants and some five thousand Indians, and Alexander already had his siege engines put together, and they were now being brought up to the wall. But the Macedonians, before any part of the wall was battered, began to undermine it, for it was of brick, and then setting up their ladders all round, captured the city by assault. And in the capture of the city there perished some seventeen thousand of the Indians, and over seventy thousand were captured, with three hundred wagons, and five hundred horsemen. Of Alexander's force were lost rather under a hundred in the entire siege, the wounded were out of proportion to the slain over twelve hundred among them several of the officers and Lysimachus the officer of the body guard.

Alexander, when he had buried the dead, after his custom sent Eumenes[1] the clerk to the two cities which had rebelled at the same time as Sangala giving him three hundred cavalry to announce to the defenders of the cities the capture of Sangala, and to proclaim that Alexander would not treat them harshly if they stayed where they were and received Alexander in a friendly way just as he had shown no harshness to any other of the self governing Indians who had voluntarily surrendered. But they for they had already heard that Alexander had captured Sangala by assault were terrified, left their cities, and took to flight. Alexander pursued them hotly, as soon as their flight was reported to him but most of them had got safe away, for the pursuit began after some interval had passed. Any that had been left behind through infirmity during the withdrawal were captured there and put to death by the army, up to the number of five hundred. But deciding not to pursue the fugitives further Alexander returned to Sangala razed the city to the ground and gave over the territory to those Indians who had formerly been self governing but recently had surrendered voluntarily. Porus with his force he sent back to the cities which had surrendered, to set garrisons in them; and he with his army advanced to the Hyphasis, to subdue the Indians of that district also. For he felt there could be no end of the war as long as any hostility remained.

XXV On the other side of the Hyphasis, so it was reported to Alexander, the country was fertile, the men good labourers of the soil and valiant warriors, who managed their own affairs in an orderly manner, most of them were under aristocracies yet these made no demands other than reasonable These people also had a number of elephants, a good many more than the other Indians, and these were, moreover, very large and courageous. This report only stirred Alexander to a desire for still further advance; but the Macedonians' spirits were already flagging, seeing the King undertaking toils after toils and dangers after dangers, meetings took place in the camp of men who grumbled at their present fate—those of the better kind—and of others who maintained stoutly that they would follow no farther not even though Alexander should lead them. When Alexander heard of this, before this disturbance in the troops and their despair grew worse, he summoned the brigadiers and addressed them thus:

"I observe that you, Macedonians and allied forces, are not following me into dangers any longer with your old spirit. I have summoned you together, warfare, I may tell him that there remains no great stretch of land before us up to the river Ganges and the eastern sea. This sea, I assure you, you will find that the Hyrcanian Sea joins, for the great sea of ocean circles round the entire earth. Yes, and I shall moreover make clear to Macedonians and allies alike that the Indian gulf forms but one stretch of water with the Persian gulf and the Hyrcanian Sea with the Indian gulf. And from the Persian gulf our fleet shall sail round to Libya,[1] right up to the Pillars of Heracles, and from the Pillars all Libya that lies within[2] is becoming ours; and all Asia likewise and the boundaries of the empire in Asia, those boundaries which God set for the whole earth. But if you flinch now there will be many warlike races left behind on the far side of the Hyphasis up to the Eastern Sea, and many too stretching from these to the Hyrcanian Sea towards the north wind, and not far from these, again, the Scythian tribes, so that there is reason to fear that if we turn back now such territory as we now hold, being yet unconsolidated, may be stirred to revolt by such as we do not yet hold. Then in very truth there will be no profit from our many labours, or we shall need once more, from the very beginning, more dangers and more labours. But, do you abide constant, Macedonians and allies. It is those who endure toil and who dare dangers that achieve glorious deeds, and it is a lovely thing to live with courage, and to die, leaving behind an everlasting renown. Or do you not know that our forefather[1] would never have risen to such heights of glory by remaining in Tyrins or in Argos, nay not even in the Peloponnese or Thebes as to become, and to be held to be, a god, who was afterwards a man? Nay, even Dionysus, a god of higher rank than Heracles, braved labours not a few; but we have actually passed beyond Nysa, and the rock Aornus, which Heracles could not take, we have taken. Add now to the possessions you have already won what yet remains of Asia; to the many add the few. For indeed what great or noble thing could we ourselves have achieved, had we sat still in Macedonia and thought it enough to guard our own home without ever merely reducing the Thracians on our borders or Illyrians or Triballians, or even such Greeks as might not be useful to us?

If then while you were bearing labours and braving dangers I had led you, myself your leader, without labours and without dangers, you would not unnaturally have become weary in your hearts, when you alone had all the labours and were procuring the prizes thereof for others; but it is not so, our labours are shared in common, we bear an equal part in dangers, the prizes are open to all. For the land is yours, it is you who are its overseers; the greater part of the treasure comes to you; and when we master all Asia then, by Heaven! —I will not merely satisfy you, but will surpass the utmost hope of good things for each of you, I will send home all who desire to go home or will myself

XXVII. To this effect, and in this manner, spoke Alexander, and for a long time there was silence, no one dared to oppose the king on the spur of the moment, nor was yet willing to agree. But in this interval Alexander often invited any to speak who wished to speak if he really held opposite views to those he had expressed. Yet even so silence reigned long and only after some time Coenus, Polemocrates son plucked up his courage and spoke thus:

"Seeing that you, sir, do not yourself desire to command the Macedonians tyrannically, but expressly state that you will lead them on only by gaining their approval and failing this you will not compel them, I shall not speak these words on behalf of us here present, who being held in honour beyond the rest have, most of us, already received the prizes of our labours, and in virtue of our authority, because we have power, are in all things heartily ready beyond others to forward your interests, rather I shall speak for most of the army. And even on their behalf I shall not say merely what is pleasing to them but what I consider useful to yourself for the moment and safest for the future. In virtue of my age it is proper that I should not conceal such views as appear best, and also in virtue of my repute among my comrades, which comes from you, and of my undisputed courage in all labours and dangers hitherto. For just because very many and very great achievements have been wrought by yourself our leader, and by those who set out from home with you just for that reason I judge it the more expedient to set some limit to these labours and these dangers. For you yourself see what a large body of Macedonians and Greeks we are who set forth with you, and how many we are who are now left, the Thessalians you sent home straight from Bactria perceiving that they had little heart for labours – and you did well. But of the rest of the Greeks, some have been settled in the cities which you have founded, and they do not at all remain there unwillingly, others, sharing with you labours and dangers, both they and the Macedonian forces, have lost part of their number in battle, and part have become invalided from wounds and have been left behind, some here, some there in Asia, but most of them have died of sickness, and of all that host only a few are left, and even they no longer with their old bodily strength and with their spirit even more wearied. These, one and all, have longing for parents, if they yet survive, longing for wives and children, longing even for their homeland, which they may perchance long to revisit with the treasure received from you, returning as great men, instead of little, and rich men instead of poor. But do not be a leader of unwilling troops. You will not find them like-minded towards dangers, when in their efforts no spirit of willingness will remain; rather do you yourself, if so it seems good, return to your own home, and rest at your own mother, and ordain the affairs of the Greeks, and bring back the guerdon of these many great victories to your ancestral house, and then, if so you desire, fit out another expedition, to attack these same Indian tribes that dwell towards the east, or if you prefer, to the Euxine sea, or else to Carchedon and the parts of Libya beyond Carchedon. It is for you to take the lead in all this. There will follow you other Macedonians, other Greeks, young in place of old, fresh in place of wearied, men to whom warfare will have no terrors for the moment, for want of experience of war, and will inspire their eagerness from their hopes of the future; men who therefore will follow you with even greater heartiness, seeing those who have borne labours and dared dangers before them returned safely to their own homes, rich, who once were poor and famous, who once were nameless. A noble thing, O King, above all others is the spirit of self-restraint when all goes well with us. For you indeed as our leader and as commander of such an army, there is no fear from any enemies; but to all men the stroke of fortune comes unlooked for, and thence unguarded.

XXVII. At the close of Coenus' speech there was some applause among the bystanders, many even shed tears, a proof if it were needed of the reluctance of their feelings towards further progress, and of the joy with which they would hail a retreat. But Alexander, irritated at Coenus' freedom of language and at the want of courage of the other officers, dismissed the conference, and calling for next day the same officers once more he angrily affirmed that he himself was going on, but that he would compel no Macedonian against his will to go with him; for he would have, he said, others who would, of free will, follow their King. As for those who wished to return home, they might do so, and might tell abroad to their friends that they had come back, hearing their King surrounded by foes. With this he went back to his tent and did not admit even any of the Companions during that day and till the third day after, waiting to see if the Macedonians and allies might change their minds, as often happens in a crowd of soldiers, and such change coming over them might render them more amenable. But when there continued dead silence through the camp, and it was clear that the men were annoyed at his temper but in no mood to change their minds because of it, then Ptolemaeus son of Lagus tells us he none the less offered sacrifices with a view to crossing the river. But as he sacrificed the victims proved unfavourable. Then he called together the eldest of the Companions and chiefly his particular friends, and since everything now was pointing to a withdrawal, he proclaimed openly to the army that he had decided to turn back.

XXIX. At this they all cried aloud as a mixed multitude would shout in joy, and most of them began to weep; others drew near the royal tent and invoked blessings on Alexander since he had allowed himself to be defeated by them and none others. Then he divided the army into twelve parts and ordered an altar to be set up for each part, in height like to the greatest towers, and in breadth greater even than towers would be, as thank-offerings to the gods who had brought him so far victorious, and as memorials of his labours. And when the altars were made ready, he sacrificed upon them according to custom, and held a contest of athletics and cavalry exercises. As the territory as far as the Hyphasis he gave also to Porus to rule over, and then he himself began to return towards the Hydraotes. Crossing this, he came again to the Acesines, and there he found the city already built which Hephaestion had been appointed by him to fortify; into this he settled any of the neighbouring tribesmen who volunteered, and such of the mercenaries as were no longer fit for service, and himself made preparations for the voyage down to the Great Sea.

Meantime there came to him Arsaces the governor of the territory next to Abisares, with Abisares' brother, and his other relatives, bringing gifts, such as the Indians account of chief value, and the elephants from Abisares, up to the number of thirty, for Abisares himself had been unable, through illness, to attend. There came also with these the envoys sent by Alexander to Abisares. Thus, being easily assured that the facts were as stated, he gave to Abisares the governorship of his own province, and attached Arsaces to the administration of Abisares; and having arranged for the tributes they should bring he sacrificed also at the river Acesines. Then crossing the Acesines he came to the Hydaspes, where he restored by help of his troops, the parts of the cities of Nicaea and Bucephala which had been damaged by rains, and also put all else in order in the province.

BOOK VI

1. Since Alexander had all ready for him on the banks of the Hydaspes a good many thirty-oars and two-tier galleys[1] and several transports for horses and other vessels useful for the conveyance of an army by river, he determined to sail down the Hydaspes to the Great Sea. He had already seen crocodiles in the Indus, and in no other river except the Nile,[2] and besides this had observed on the banks of the Acesines beans growing[3] of the same sort as the soil of Egypt produces; and having heard that the Acesines runs into the Indus, he fancied that he had found the origin of the Nile. His idea was that the Nile rose somewhere thereabouts in India, flowed through a great expanse of desert, and there lost its name of Indus; and then, where it began to flow through inhabited country, was now called Nile by the Ethiopians in those parts and the Egyptians (as Homer in his epic called it Aegyptus after Egypt), and so finally entered the Inland Sea. Also when writing to Olympias about the country of India, Alexander among other things stated that he thought he had discovered the springs of the Nile, drawing a conclusion about matters of fore and aft. But it seems likely that these descriptive names came to be used [illegible] to designate the size of the ships, without implying the actual number of tiers of rowers.

[2] There are crocodiles also in the Ganges.

[3] Said to be Nelumbium speciosum, the Indian lotus.

so much importance from very slender indications. But when he had more accurately investigated the geography of the river Indus, he learnt from the inhabitants that the Hydaspes joins its stream to the Acesines, and the Acesines to the Indus, and both there resign their names, but that the Indus then flows out into the Great Ocean, by two mouths, and that the Indus has nothing whatever to do with Egypt. On this he cancelled the part of the letter to his mother which dealt with the Nile. Then, with the idea of sailing down the rivers to the ocean, he caused the boats to be made ready for him for this purpose. The crews of his boats were made up from the Phoenicians, Cyprians, Carians and Egyptians who had accompanied the expedition.

II. At this time Coenus, one of the most trusty of the Companions of Alexander, died of illness. So far as could be done, Alexander gave him a magnificent funeral. Then, calling together the Companions and such Indian envoys as had come to visit him, he proclaimed Porus King of so much of India as he had captured up to that time, that is, of seven nations in all, and of cities in these nations more than two thousand in number. The army he then divided as follows. He embarked on the ships with him all the bodyguard, the archers, the Agrianes, and the special squadron of cavalry. Craterus led along the right bank of the Hydaspes a division of the infantry and the cavalry. Along the other bank Hephaestion advanced, leading the greatest and strongest part of the army and the elephants, of which there were now some two hundred; this force was under orders to make at full speed for the palace of Sopeithes. Philip the satrap of the country west of the Indus, towards Bactria, had orders also to wait three days and then follow with his forces. The cavalry of Nysa he sent back there. Nearchus he appointed admiral of all the fleet, and the pilot of his own vessel was Onesicritus, who in the history he wrote of Alexander told this falsehood among others that he was admiral, though a mere pilot. The entire number of ships, according to Ptolemaeus son of Lagus, whom I chiefly follow, was eighty ships of thirty oars, and the entire number of boats with the transports, the light galleys, and any other river craft that had either been long plying on the rivers or that had been then constructed, came to nearly two thousand.

III Then, when everything had been got ready, at dawn the army began its embarkation, and Alexander sacrificed to the gods according to his custom, and to the river Hydaspes according to the instructions of the seers. Then himself embarking he poured a libation into the river out of a golden bowl from the bows, calling upon the Acesines together with the Hydaspes, since he had learned that it is the greatest of all the tributaries of the Hydaspes, and also that the meeting of the waters was not far away, and he also called upon the Indus, into which, with the Hydaspes, the Acesines runs. And then when he had likewise poured a Bhution to Heracles his ancestor and to Ammon and to the other gods to whom he usually made offering, he bade the bugle sound for departure. On the sound of the bugle they started in due order. For instructions had been given as to the exact distances apart for the baggage vessels for the horse transports and for the warships, so that they should not by using irregular oars, collide with the other. Even those which sailed most swiftly were not permitted to break ranks. It was very remarkable to hear the sound of the rowing when so large a fleet all began rowing at one and the same moment, and the calls of the boatswains giving the begin ning and the pauses of each stroke and the noise of the rowers, when all together they fell upon the swirling water and raised their rowers' chant, the banks too, being often higher than the ships, enclosed the sound into a narrow flume and making it by this compression even more resonant, reverberated it from side to side. Indians also here and there on either side of the river by their emptiness and their re echoings all helped the swelling of the sound. The horses too, visible in the horse transports and no horses had hitherto been seen on shipboard in India, for the Indians had no recollection that the expedition of Dionysus also to India was by ship - caused the utmost astonishment to the tribesmen who beheld them, so that those who were present at the departure of the fleet followed with it a long distance and those Indians from among those who had submitted to Alexander to whom the clamour of the oarsmen and the beat of the oars reached, came also running down to the bank and followed singing their own wild songs. For the Indians are of all people most musical, and from the days of Dionysus down and of those who revelled with him in India are great lovers of the dance.

IV Sailing thus, on the third day Alexander put in where orders had been given to Hephaestion and Craterus to camp at the same place but on opposite banks. There he stayed two days, and when Philippus joined him with the rest of the army, he sent him to the river Acesines with such troops as he had brought, bidding him march along the bank of the Acesines. The troops with Craterus and Hephaestion also he sent on again, giving them instructions as to their route. But he himself sailed on down the river Hydaspes, which never had a less breadth, during the descent, than twenty stades. Then putting in, wherever it was convenient, to the banks, he received in voluntary submission many of the Indians who lived near the Hydaspes, some, who had revolted, he had already subdued. But he sailed at full speed towards the district of the Malians and the Oxydracae, learning that they were the most numerous and the most warlike of the Indians in these parts, and also because it was reported to him that they had removed their wives and children to the strongest of their cities, and were themselves determined to do battle with him; and for this reason he urged on his voyage with the greater speed, so that he might come upon them not ready for war, but still short of their preparations and in a state of confusion. And so he started again thence, and on the fifth day came to the meeting of the Hydaspes and the Acesines. Where these rivers meet, from the two streams one very narrow stream results, its current is very rapid because of this narrowing, and from the swirling of the stream there are formed dreadful whirlpools; the water boils and dashes noisily, so that from far off one can hear the tumult of the waves. All this had been told to Alexander beforehand by the inhabitants, and by him to his army, but yet when the army approached the meeting waters the noise of the rapids was so loud that the sailors stopped their rowing, not by order, but because the boatswains were struck dumb with amazement, and the sailors themselves were out of their wits from the tumult.

V When, however, they drew near the meeting of the waters, then the steersmen bade them row as strenuously as possible and drive their vessels through the narrows, so that the ships might not be caught in the whirlpools and be capsized by them, but rather that they should by their rowing overcome the turmoil of the water. The rounder types of boats, which were twisted about by the stream, suffered nothing serious in this disturbance, except that they caused much anxiety to the crews, they kept a straight course, being in fact held to their direction by the current itself. The long ships, however, did not come off so scathless in the turmoil, they did not ride so easily over the roaring waters, and those that had two tiers of oars hardly kept their lower tier clear of the stream. Moreover, their oars, when the boats were brought broadside on in the swirling waters, were broken—of such, at any rate, as were actually caught by the rapids and did not contrive to skim swiftly over them, so that many ships were in distress, and two collided with one another and were themselves wrecked and many from their crews lost. When, however the river broadened out, at last the stream no longer ran so roughly, and the eddies did not twist the ships about with so much violence. Alexander then bringing his army to land on the right bank where there was shelter from the current and a landing place for the ships, and where a headland ran out into the river conveniently for the gathering in of the wrecked ships and any of the crews still left alive on them contrived to save these, and repaired the damaged ships; after this he bade Nearchus sail down until he reached the boundaries of the Malian people, he himself made a hasty raid through the country of the tribesmen who had not submitted to him and so prevented them from bringing help to the Malians. On this he again joined the fleet.

Here Hephaestion and Craterus and Philip with their troops joined him again. Alexander then took the elephants and Peucestas's brigade and the mounted archers and Philip with his force, across the river Hydaspes, and ordered Craterus to take command of them. Nearchus he sent with the fleet ordering him to be three days in advance of the army in the descent of the river. The remaining forces he divided into three parts. Hephaestion he ordered to go on five days in advance so that if any who had escaped from his own forces were advancing rapidly into the country farther on, they should fall in with Hephaestion's troops and be captured, but Ptolemaeus son of Lagus, to whom he handed over a part of the army, he bade follow him at the interval of three days, so that any who turned back again, fleeing from himself, might likewise fall in with Ptolemaeus and his troops. And as soon as they should arrive at the junction of the Acesines and Hydraotes, there he bade those who went in advance to wait till he himself should arrive and till the forces of Craterus and Ptolemaeus should join up with him.

VI Then he himself took with him the bodyguards, the archers, the Agrianes, and Perdiccas's brigade of the so-called Infantry Companions, with all the mounted archers, and half the Companions' cavalry, and led them through a waterless country towards the Malloans, an Indian tribe, part of the self governing Indians. On the first day he camped by a small pond, about a hundred stades from the river Acesines, and when he had dined, and had rested his army a short time, he passed the word along that every vessel anyone had was to be filled with water. Then marching about four hundred stades, during the remainder of that day and through the night, at daybreak he arrived at a city into which many of the Malloans had fled for refuge, but they, never dreaming that Alexander would march against them through this waterless region, were for the most part outside the city and unarmed. Alexander clearly had marched by this route, simply because it was especially difficult for him to march by it, and for that very reason none of his enemies could believe it possible that he would come that way. So them falling upon them unexpecting he slew the greater part of them, who did not even resist being as they were unarmed. The rest had fled into the city, and Alexander stationed therefore his cavalry round in a cordon, using the cavalry thus instead of a fence, since his infantry force had not yet come up with him. But as soon as ever the infantry did come up he sent Perdiccas with his own cavalry regiment and that of Coenus with the Agrianes, against another city of the Malcans, whither many of the Indians of the district had fled for refuge, bidding him watch them in the city but not to begin action before the former should arrive, so as to prevent any flying over from the city to bring the other tribesmen that Alexander was already well on the way. Then he himself attacked the city wall, but the tribesmen deserted the wall having no hope of defending it further, a good many of them perished in the assault, others were no longer fit for service from wounds, and taking refuge in the citadel, for some time they continued to defend themselves from this, which was a commanding position and besides difficult to assault. But as the Macedonians pressed on steadily from all sides, and as Alexander himself was here, there and everywhere in the action, the citadel was taken by assault, and all who had taken refuge there were put to the sword, to the number of about two thousand.

Perdiccas meanwhile arrived at the city to which he had been sent, and found it deserted, but learning that the inhabitants had not long fled, he rode at full speed in the track of the fugitives and the light-armed infantry followed with the best speed they could muster. He caught up with and massacred so many of the fugitives as had not managed to escape into the marshes.

VII. Alexander, after seeing that his troops had dined and rested, began his advance again about the first watch. He marched a considerable distance during the night and at daybreak arrived at the river Hydraotes. There he learned that most of the Malians had already crossed, he fell in with others who were actually crossing and slew many of them during the crossing. He crossed himself there and then with them by the same crossing and also pursuing pressed hard upon those who had got away ahead of him. Many of these he slew, some he captured alive, but the greater number got safe away to a strong fortified position. But Alexander, as soon as his infantry came up with him, sent against these Perdiccas with his own brigade and two regiments of cavalry. They attacked and on the first assault captured the stronghold and enslaved all those who had taken refuge there except such as had fallen in the assault. Then Perdiccas and his detachment, having finished all this, returned back again to the camp.

But Alexander himself was now advancing to a city of the Brachmans, learning that some of the Malians had taken refuge there. And when he arrived there he set up to the wall his phalanx in close formation on all sides. The Indians, seeing their walls undermined and being deserted by the enemies, deserted their walls, as the others had, and taking refuge in the citadel defended themselves there. A few Macedonians, however broke in with them whereupon they, turning to bay and forming a solid mass drove out some of the attackers and slew some twenty five of them while they attempted to withdraw. Meanwhile Alexander ordered ladders on all sides to be placed against the citadel, and the wall to be undermined. And when a tower, being undermined, fell and part of the wall between the towers being breached made the citadel easier of assault on that side, Alexander first mounted the wall and all could see him holding it. Observing him the rest of the Macedonians feeling ashamed mounted, one here, and one there. And by this time the citadel was in their hands, and of the Indians some set fire to their houses, and being captured in them, were put to death but most of them perished fighting. Up to five thousand in all fell, but owing to their brave defence only a few were captured alive.

VIII. Alexander remained there one day and rested his army and on the next day began his advance against the remaining Mallians. He found the cities deserted but learned that the inhabitants had fled into the desert. There again he rested his army one day, and for the next day sent Peithon and Demetrius the cavalry commander back to the river, with the troops they had been in command of, giving them besides three such companies of foot soldiers as were enough for their enterprise. Alexander commanded them to go along the river bank, and if they should come across any of those who had fled for refuge to the woods, of which there was abundance along the river bank to put them to death, except such as voluntarily surrendered. Peithon and Demetrius' troops did in fact find large numbers in the woods, and put them to death.

Alexander himself, however, marched against the greatest city of the Malians, whither it was reported to him many had fled out of the other cities. But even this city the Indians deserted when they learnt of Alexander's approach; and crossing the Hydraotes they stood their ground, drawn up in order, on the banks, since these were of a good height, with the idea of preventing Alexander from crossing. As soon as he heard that he took all the cavalry which he had with him and made for the Hydraotes, where it was reported that the Malians were marshalled, the infantry was ordered to follow. And when he reached the river and saw the enemy in battle order on the far side, without any hesitation he plunged from the road into the ford with the cavalry only. The enemy, seeing Alexander already in midstream, retired from the bank rapidly but in good order, Alexander following on with only his cavalry. But when the Indians saw he had cavalry only, they turned about and made a vigorous resistance in number about fifty thousand. Alexander seeing their infantry formation broad, and with his own infantry not yet on the field, kept circling round and making charges, but without coming to close quarters with the Indians. By this time the Agrianes and other companies of the light troops had joined him, these were picked troops which he had in his own force, and also the archers. Not far off the main body of the infantry was visible. The Indians, then, with all these terrors converging upon them, turned, and now in full flight, made for a fortified city near by. Alexander, however, following close upon them slew large numbers, and when the fugitives had been received into the city, he first marching on, threw his cavalry in a circle round the city, and when his infantry came up, for this day he encamped all round the wall, since he had not much daylight left for the attack, and his army, the infantry from their long march, the cavalry from their close pursuit, and all especially from the crossing of the river were much distressed.

IX. The next day Alexander divided his army, and taking the command of one part himself began his attack on the wall. The other part he handed over to Perdiccas. Meanwhile the Indians did not await the attack of the Macedonians, but deserted the walls of the city, and themselves fled together to the citadel. Alexander however, and his troops tore down a small gate and penetrated into the city far in advance of the rest. But those under Perdiccas' command fell behind having difficulty in getting over the wall, and most of them carried no ladders, since they thought the city had actually been captured, when they saw the walls bereft of their defenders. When, however it was obvious that the citadel was in the enemy's hands, and in front of it were seen many defenders drawn up to fight from thence, some at once began undermining the wall, others set ladders wherever opportunity offered and tried to force a way into the citadel. But Alexander, thinking that the Macedonians who

But Alexander, standing as he was upon the wall, was shot at all round from the neighbouring towers, for none of the Indians dared to approach him, and also from those in the city, these indeed being within short range, for at this point there was a mound near the wall. Alexander was indeed most conspicuous, both by the splendour of his arms and by his miraculous courage; and he felt that by remaining where he was he would run a very great risk and yet do no achievement worthy of note, but that if he leapt down within the wall he might perhaps by this very action frighten the Indians, while if he must be endangered he might die not ignobly, after doing great deeds, worthy for those that came after to hear of. With this thought he leapt down from the wall and into the citadel. There taking firm stand by the wall, he smote with his sword and slew some who came to grips with him, and even the Indians' commander in chief, who came very boldly to attack him; another as he approached he checked by hurling a stone, and another in the same way, but anyone who came within striking distance he smote again with his sword. The Indians were no longer ready to approach him but keeping at a distance showered missiles upon him from all sides, whatever anyone had in his hand, or could lay his hands upon.

X. Meanwhile Peucestas and Abreas of the Distinguished Service Order and Leonnatus with them, the only men who had managed to get on to the wall before the ladders broke, leapt down also and fought to defend their King. Abreas indeed fell there shot with an arrow in the face, and Alexander himself also was struck, right through the corslet into his breast over the lung, so that according to Ptolemy, breath together with blood shot forth from the wound. Yet Alexander as long as the blood was still warm, kept defending himself; but when a good deal of blood came forth, in a thick stream, as would be with the breath, he was overcome by dizziness and faintness, and fell there where he stood bending over his shield. Peucestas stood astride of him as he lay there, and holding up before him the sacred shield from Ilium, and Leonnatus on the other side, they two received the showers of missiles while Alexander from his of bread was near to fainting For the conduct of the Macedonian assault had come to a deadlock at this point, since those who saw Alexander exposed to missiles on the wall and then leaping inside into the citadel, these, both through ardour and fear lest their king should come to harm by this thoughtless daring broke down the ladders and contrived various expedients for scaling the wall in this difficulty some hammered pegs into the wall, which was of clay and clinging to these managed with difficulty to clamber up, others too mounted on their comrades shoulders The first to ascend threw himself down from the wall into the city where they saw the king lying and all lamented and raised their battle cry And already a severe battle was raging about the fallen king, now one now another of the Macedonians bearing his shield over him, but in the meantime some of the troops had severed the bar with which the gate between the towers was barred and so passed in in small detachments others then put their shoulders to a gap broken in the door and pushed it towards the space within the wall, and so opened up the citadel on this side.

XI And now some began to slaughter the Indians, and they slew them all sparing neither child nor woman while others carried off the king who was in very evil plight, on the shield no longer thinking that he could live Some authorities recorded that Critodemus a physician of Cos by birth of the family of Asclepius drew out the arrow from the wound cutting the part which it had struck others that Perdiccas of the bodyguard, no surgeon being at hand in the emergency cut the wound with his sword at Alexander's express command and so drew out the arrow. In the withdrawal there was a great rush of blood, so that Alexander fainted again and the haemorrhage was thus checked by his fainting. A great many other stories have been written by the historians about this disaster and legend has handed them on as the first fashioners told them and still keeps them alive to this day; and we indeed never cease handing on these falsehoods to others in turn, unless it be checked by this my history.

To begin with, tradition is unanimous that this disaster happened to Alexander among the Oxydracae, whereas it took place among the Malians, an independent Indian tribe. The city was a Malian city and they were Malians who wounded Alexander, they had indeed determined to join the Oxydracae and so fight together, but Alexander reached them too quickly marching through the desert before any help had time to reach them from the Oxydracae, or they give any help to the Oxydracae. In the same way universal tradition has it that the last battle with Darius, that in which Darius fled and continued his flight until he was captured by Bessus and his followers, and perished, while Alexander was pressing hard upon him, took place at Arbela, and the battle before this at Issus and the first, the cavalry battle at Granicus. Actually a cavalry battle took place at Granicus, and the second battle against Darius at Issus, but most historians state that Arbela was six hundred stades away from the place where Darius and Alexander fought their last battle, those who make the distance least, put it at five hundred stades. But Ptolemaeus and Aristobulus state that the battle took place at Gaugamela by the river Bumodus. Gaugamela, moreover, was not a city but a large village, it was not an important place, and the name has rather an awkward sound, and thus, as I opine, Arbela, being a city, carried off the glory of this great battle. If, however, we must hold that this engagement took place at Arbela when it was actually at such a distance from Arbela, we may as well hold that the naval battle at Salamis took place at the isthmus of Corinth, and the battle of Artemisium in Euboea at Argina or Sunium.

Then again as to those who protected Alexander with their shields in his grave danger, all agree that one was Peucestas, but they do not agree about Leonnatus nor yet about Abreas, the winner of the Distinguished Service Order. Then some say that Alexander was struck on the helmet with a club, and became dizzy, and so fell, and then, rising up again, was struck with a shot in the breast, right through his breastplate, but Ptolemaeus son of Lagus states that there was only this one wound, that in the breast.[1] But I reckon the greatest error of those who wrote histories of Alexander to be this, Ptolemaeus son of Lagus, according to some authorities, mounted up with Alexander up the ladder together with Peucestas, and held his shield over him as he lay there, and for this Ptolemaeus was always called in addition the Saviour, whereas Ptolemaeus himself has recorded that he was not so much as present in this action, but in fact was at the head of his own force and was fighting other battles and against other tribesmen. This much I must be permitted to have said, by way of digression, so that those who come afterwards may give some pains to the narrative of such great deeds and disasters.

XII While Alexander was resting here and getting treatment for his wound, the first report reached the camp whence he had set out against the Mallians that he had died from the wound. And first there was a lamentation from all the army as one told the report to another, then, while ceasing their lamentation, they were disheartened and despairing as to the future leader of the host (for both in Alexander's opinion and in the Macedonians' many seemed to be equal in reputation), and despairing too how they might get back safe to their own homes, with all these warlike nations closing them round in a circle, some of whom had not yet surrendered, and these seemed likely to fight stoutly for their freedom, and others were certain to revolt, if the dread of Alexander was removed from them. Then they believed that they were at the time in the midst of impassable rivers, and everything seemed to them helpless and hopeless if they had lost Alexander. Yet when news came that Alexander was alive, they hardly believed it, and they could not believe that he could yet survive. But when a letter came from him that he would shortly come to the camp, even then most of them could not believe this for excess of fear but they thought that it was made up by his bodyguards and officers.

XIII. Alexander learning of this state of things to prevent any disturbance in the army, was carried, as soon as ever he was able to the bank of the river Hydraotes, and then sailing down-stream for the camp was at the junction of the Hydraotes and the Acesines, where Hephaestion was in command of the army and where Nearchus had his fleet, as soon as the boat with the King on board began to draw near to the camp he ordered the awning to be taken off the stern so that everyone might see him. But the troops even now disbelieved saying to themselves that Alexander's dead body was being brought down, but at length when the ship had put in at the bank, Alexander held up his hand towards the multitude and they shouted aloud, some holding up their hands to heaven, and others towards Alexander himself, and many involuntary tears were shed in the unexpectedness of their joy. Some of the bodyguard brought a litter for him as he was being carried out of the ship but he bade his horse be brought alongside. And when he mounted the horse, and all saw him the whole army clapped their hands again and again and the banks and the glens near the banks re-echoed the sound. Then when Alexander drew near his pavilion he dismounted from his horse, so that the army beheld him walking. Then they all ran towards him from this side and that, some touching his hands some his knees, some his garment others just looked on him from near at hand and with a blessing upon him went his way, some cast wreaths upon him, some such flowers as the country of India bare at that time.

Nearchus tells us that he was angry with those of his friends who rebuked him for running so great a risk in advance of the army, thus, they said, was a soldier's part, not a commander's. My own idea is that Alexander was angry with these reproaches because he knew that they were true and that he had laid himself open to this rebuke. And yet from his enthusiasm in battle and his passion for glory he, just as others are overcome by some pleasure, was not strong enough to keep out of dangers. Nearchus goes on to say that an oldish man, a Boeotian he does not give his name, perceiving that Alexander was angry with his friends' reproaches and showed his indignation in his features, came up to him and in his Boeotian dialect said: 'Alexander, noble deeds are men's work,' and added an iambic verse of which the general tenour was: 'Suffering is the meed of him that doth great deed.'[1] The speaker won Alexander's immediate approval and thenceforward his closer friendship.

XIV. At this time came envoys from the rest of the Malians offering surrender of the tribe, and from the Oxydracae the governors of the cities and the district governors in person and others of their chief personages, up to the number of a hundred and fifty, as plenipotentiaries to discuss terms, bringing the most precious Indian gifts and they also offering surrender of their tribe. They urged that their error was pardonable, in that they had not sent envoys earlier; they above all others were desirous to have freedom and to be self-governing, that freedom indeed they had preserved intact from the days when Phoenrus came into India up to Alexander, but if it surpassed Alexander since report had it that Alexander for was descended from gods they would accept any governor whom Alexander should appoint and would pay such tribute as might seem good to Alexander and they would give hostages so many as Alexander should require. Alexander demanded a thousand of the chief men of the tribe whom he should if he desired keep as hostages, or if otherwise should have them serving with his army that he should finish his wars against the rest of the Indians. They duly sent the thousand men choosing out the most important and greatest of their tribe and men, mounted five hundred horsemen and the chariots. And Alexander appointed Philip as satrap over them and he [illegible] Macedonians he then returned to them the hostages, but retained the chariots.

When he had put all this in order and as soon as a large number of additional boats had been constructed during the period of his convalescence from the wound he embarked on the ships seventeen hundred cavalry of the Companions and of the light armed troops the same number as before and up to ten thousand infantry and sailed a short way down the Hydraotes but where the Hydraotes joined the Acesines, since there the name Acesines takes precedence over Hydraotes, he sailed down the Acesines, till he came to the meeting of the Acesines and Indus. For these four great rivers, all navigable, pour their waters into the Indus not each with its original name, but the Hydaspes runs into the Acesines, and pouring in its whole stream accepts the name Acesines, then again the Acesines meets the Hydraotes, and taking in this tributary remains the Acesines, then next the Acesines takes in the Hyphasis and still in its own name runs into the Indus, but once having done so is merged into the Indus, and thence the Indus, before it splits into its delta, must be, I think, some hundred stades broad, and perhaps more, where it becomes more lake than river.

XV There at the junction of the Acesines and Indus Alexander remained till Perdiccas joined him with his army after subduing on his march the independent tribe of Abastanes. At this time also there joined Alexander further thirty-oared ships and other transport vessels which had been built for him among the Xathrians, who had surrendered to him, being another independent Indian tribe. Envoys came too from the Oxadrians, who also are an independent tribe of Indians, they offered the submission of the Oxadrians. Alexander then fixed as the boundaries of Philip's satrapy the junction of the Acesines and Indus and left with him all the Thracians, and from the ordinary brigades such troops as seemed enough to garrison the country. He bade him also found there a city just at the meeting of the two rivers, having entertained a hope that such a city would become great and famous in the world; he also ordered dockyards to be built. And about this time Oxyartes the Bactrian, father of Roxane Alexander's wife, came to visit Alexander, and Alexander gave him in addition the satrapy over the Paraparnisadae, removing Tyriaspes the former satrap, since this Tiryaspes was reported to him to be conducting his office in a disorderly manner

Then Alexander caused Craterus and the greater part of the army and the elephants to be ferried across to the left bank of the river Indus; since the journey along the river-bank seemed easier on that side to heavy troops, and also since the tribes on the river-bank were not everywhere friendly. Then he himself sailed down towards the royal city of Sogdia. There he built and fortified a new city, and made new dockyards, and had his damaged boats refitted. As satrap of the country from the meeting of the Indus and the Acesines up to the sea, with all the coast-line of the country of India, he appointed Oxyartes with Peitho.

Craterus then he sent back again with his army (through the territory of the Arachotians and Drangians) while he himself sailed down-stream towards the kingdom of Musicanus, which was reported to be the richest of all India, since Musicanus had not yet presented himself to surrender himself and his country, nor had sent envoys to establish friendly relations; nor indeed had sent anything at all, as one naturally would to a great King, nor had made any request from Alexander The voyage down the river proved so swift that he arrived at the borders of Musicanus' realm before Musicanus became aware that Alexander had started in his direction Amazed then by this swiftness of movement, Musicanus at once went to meet Alexander, bringing gifts such as are accounted most valuable among the Indians, and leading thither all his elephants, moreover submitting himself and his people and acknowledging his error which was the most potent method with Alexander of obtaining what anyone might desire. And, sure enough, Musicanus received pardon from Alexander, and Alexander much admired his country and his capital and permitted Musicanus to remain sovereign over it. Craterus was ordered to fortify the citadel in this city, and it was so fortified while Alexander was still there, and a garrison was placed there, since the position seemed to Alexander very convenient for keeping a hold over the tribes over which he was keeping watch in the neighbourhood.

XVI. From there Alexander, taking with him the archers and the Agrianes and the cavalry which was sailing with him, made an expedition to the governor of this district, who was named Oxycanus, since he had neither come himself nor had envoys come from him to surrender himself and his district. Two of the largest cities in Oxycanus' province he took easily by assault, and in the second of these Oxycanus himself was captured. As the plunder Alexander handed over to the army, but the elephants he took away himself. Other cities in the same district surrendered on Alexander's approach, no one resisting, so completely had the spirit of all the Indians been broken by Alexander and Alexander's good fortune.

Next Alexander advanced against Sambus, who had been appointed by himself satrap of the Indian hinterland, he was reported to have made good his escape on learning that Alexander had forgiven Musicanus and allowed him to continue ruler of his province, for Sambus and Musicanus were at enmity. But when Alexander was now approaching the city which was the capital of Sambus' territory, its name being Sindimana, the gates were opened to him at his coming and the relatives of Sambus counted out his treasure and went to meet Alexander, bringing with them all the elephants; they represented that Sambus' flight had not been due to any ill will towards Alexander, but he had been frightened at his clemency towards Musicanus. At this same time Alexander captured another city which had rebelled and he put to death those of the Brachmans, the learned pundits of India, who had been responsible for the revolt. The wisdom of these men, such as it is, I shall discuss in my Indian History.

XVII. In the midst of all this the revolt of Musicanus was announced. Against him Alexander sent Peithon son of Agenor the satrap with a sufficient force. He himself advanced against the cities subject to Musicanus and of some he sold the inhabitants into slavery, razing the cities to the ground, in others he established garrisons and fortified citadels. Then when he had completed this he returned to his camp and fleet. Hither too Musicanus, now a captive, was brought by Peithon, and Alexander bade them hang him in his own land, together with such of the Brachmans who had been the instigators of Musicanus' revolt. There arrived here also the governor of the territory of Pattala, the territory which I stated to be the delta made by the river Indus, greater than the Egyptian delta, he offered in surrender all his territory and committed himself and all that he had to Alexander. Alexander sent him back again to his own realm, bidding him make all ready for the reception of the army; then he despatched Craterus with the brigade of Attalus and those of Meleager and Antigenes, some of the archers, and so many of the Companions and the other Macedonians as he was already sending back to Macedonia as being past service, to go by the road through the Arachotians and Zarangians to Carmania, he also gave Craterus the elephants to take with him. Over the rest of the army Hephaestion was placed in command — except such part of it as was sailing with Alexander himself to the sea, but Peitho, with the mounted javelin-men and the Agrianes, he transported to the other side of the Indus, not that by which Hephaestion was to take his army, he gave orders to Peitho to settle such cities as were already fortified, and deal with any attempted rebellion among the Indians in these parts, and finally meet him at Pattala.

Now when Alexander had been already three days on the voyage, he received news that the chief of Pattala had taken with him the greater number of the tribesmen and had absconded, leaving his country desolate, and on this Alexander sailed down with even greater speed than before. On his arrival at Pattala, he found both city and ter-

He therefore despatched the lightest of his troops in pursuit of the fugitives, and when some of these had been captured, sent them away to the others, bidding them to come back without fear, for their city was theirs to dwell in as before, and their country was theirs to till. And the greater part of them did come back.

XVIII Alexander then bade Hephaestion to fortify the citadel in Pattala, and sent out others to the desert parts of the surrounding country to dig wells and to make the country inhabitable. Some of the neighbouring tribesmen, however, set upon this party, some indeed they destroyed, by the suddenness of their attack, but they lost also many of their own number, and fled away into the desert, so that those who had been sent to complete the work did so, another force having joined them, which Alexander, on hearing of the attack of the natives, had sent to help with the work.

At Pattala the stream of the Indus parts into two large rivers, both of these retaining the name "Indus" till they reach the sea. Here Alexander began to build a harbour and dockyards, and when these works had got well advanced, he proposed to sail down to the outlet of the right-hand stream where it joined the sea. He sent therefore Leonnatus, giving him a thousand of the cavalry and about eight thousand of the heavy and light armed troops to the island of Pattala, to march alongside the fleet. Then Alexander himself, taking the swiftest sailers of his fleet and the ships of one and a half banks of oars, all the thirty-oar ships and some of the fast galleys,[1] sailed down the right-hand river. But as he had no pilot, since all the Indians of these parts had fled, there were grave difficulties in the descent, and on the day after the fleet weighed, there came a great storm, and the wind blowing contrary to the current made troughs in the stream and battered the flotilla; most of the ships were damaged, and some even of the thirty-oar ships were complete wrecks. They ran them to shore, however, before they were completely shattered. Other ships therefore were built. Then he sent off the lightest of his auxiliary troops to the country on the farther bank to capture some of the Indians, and they for the rest of the way piloted the passage. Then when they came to the broadening of the river, so that it extended at its broadest to two hundred stades, the wind was blowing violently from the ocean, and the oars could hardly be plied in the waves, and they ran for shelter therefore into a side channel, to which Alexander's pilots steered them.

XIX. There they anchored, and there followed the usual feature of the ocean, the receding tide, as a result their ships were left high and dry. This Alexander's troops had not before known of, and it caused them no small amazement, but it caused even more when the time passed by and the tide came up again and the ships floated. Such of the ships as the tide found comfortably settled on the mud floated off unharmed, and sailed once more without sustaining damage, but those that were caught on a drier bottom and not remaining on an even keel, as the onrushing tide came in all together, either collided one with another, or were dashed upon the ground and shattered. These Alexander repaired as best he could, and then despatched in two of his pinnaces down-stream some of his men to explore the island by which the natives affirmed he must anchor on his voyage down to meet the sea. This island they called Cilluta. The scouts reported that there was good anchorage by the island, and that it was large, with fresh water, so the rest of his fleet put in at the island, but Alexander himself with the best sailers from among his ships went to the far side of the island, to get a view of the outlet of the river into the sea, and see if it offered a safe passage out. So advancing about two hundred stades from the island they sighted a second island, right out in the sea. On this they returned to the river island, and anchoring at a headland upon this island Alexander sacrificed to those gods to which, he used to say, Ammon had ordered him to sacrifice. Then the next day he sailed down to the island in the sea, he put in there, and sacrificed there other sacrifices to other gods and with different ceremonial; these sacrifices also, he said, he offered in accordance with the oracle given from Ammon. Then passing the mouths of the river Indus he set sail to the high seas, to see, as he himself said, if any country stood out, near by, in the ocean; but in my own judgment chiefly that he might have voyaged in the Great Ocean beyond India. Then he sacrificed bulls to Poseidon, and cast them into the sea, and poured, after the sacrifice, a libation, casting also into the sea the cup, a gold one, and golden bowls, as thank-offerings, praying also that Poseidon would safely convey his naval force, which he purposed to despatch under Nearchus towards the Persian Gulf and the mouths of the Euphrates and Tigris.

XX. After this he returned to Pattala, and found the citadel already fortified and Peitho duly arrived with his army, having successfully accomplished his whole mission. Hephaestion was now ordered to get ready everything necessary for the fortifying of the harbour and for the building of the dock-yards; for Alexander purposed to leave behind there a fleet of several ships at the city of Pattala, where the river Indus divided.

Then Alexander sailed down to the ocean again by the other mouth of the Indus, to learn by which branch the outlet of the Indus to the ocean was safer; these mouths of the river Indus are eighteen hundred stades apart from one another. And in the descent of the river he arrived at a great lake not far from the river outlet; this the river as it spreads—and possibly also from the other neighbouring streams which run into it—enlarges so that it most resembles a gulf of the sea, in fact ocean fishes were already to be seen in it, bigger than those in our own sea. Anchoring, therefore, at a point in the lake where the pilots advised him, he left behind the greater part of his troops there with Leonnatus, and all the light galleys. Then he himself, with the ships of thirty oars, and those with one and a half banks of oarsmen, passed beyond the outlet of the Indus, and proceeding by this passage also reached the sea; discovering that the passage by this branch of the Indus was an easier one. He then anchored by the shore, and taking with him some of the cavalry went three days' march along the coast, observing the nature of the country for the coasting voyage, and ordering wells to be dug, so that as they sailed along they might be able to get water. Then he himself returned to his ships and sailed back to Pattala, and sent part of his army along the foreshore to carry on this same work, bidding them also return to Pattala. Then once more he sailed down to the lake, and built another harbour and other dockyards; and leaving there a garrison, collected four months' supplies for his army and made all other necessary preparations for the voyage.

XXI. The season, however, was not suitable for sailing; for the trade winds[1] were blowing continuously, which in that season blow not, as with us, from the north, but from the ocean and from the south. But from the beginning of winter, right from the setting of the Pleiads to the winter solstice, it was reported that the ocean here was fit for navigation, for then, as would be when the land is drenched with heavy rains, there are light land breezes, convenient for the coasting voyage whether by oars or sails.

Nearchus, then, the admiral of the fleet, awaited the season for the voyage. But Alexander leaving Pattala advanced with his entire force as far as the river Arabius, and thence, taking with him half the bodyguards and the archers and the brigades of the Companions, as they were called, the special squadron of the Companions' cavalry and a squadron from each cavalry regiment, together with all the mounted archers, turned towards the ocean, keeping it on his left, in order to dig wells, so that there might be plenty of water for the army which was sailing along the coast, and also with the intention of making a surprise attack on the Oreitans, the Indian tribe in these parts, who had long been independent, since they had failed to make any friendly overtures to Alexander and his troops. Hephaestion was in command of such part of the army as Alexander had left behind. The Arabitae, however, also an independent tribe of the Indians who dwell about the river Arabius, did not appear to Alexander worth attacking, and yet they did not choose to surrender, when they learned that Alexander was approaching but fled into the desert. Alexander, however, crossed the river Arabius, a narrow river with a small stream, traversed a considerable part of the desert by night and at dawn was come to the inhabited region. Here he ordered his infantry to follow in marching order, but the cavalry he took with him and divided into squadrons, that they might cover the greatest extent of country, and thus invaded the territory of the Oreitans. Such of them as offered resistance were cut down by the cavalry, and many were captured alive. For the time being then Alexander encamped by a small stream; but on being joined by Hephaestion and his troops, he advanced further. Then arriving at a village which was the largest village of the Oreitans, called Rambacia, he was impressed with the position, and felt that a city founded there would become great and prosperous. He left behind Hephaestion therefore to attend to this.

XXII. Then Alexander, taking with him again half the bodyguards and the Agrianes, the special squadron of the cavalry, and the mounted archers, advanced towards the borders of the Gedrosians and the Oreitans, where it was reported that the approach was by a defile, and that the Gedrosians and Oreitans had joined together and were encamped at the mouth of the defile to check Alexander's approach. They were, in fact, arrayed there, but when news was brought that he was nearing them, the greater part of them fled from the defile, deserting their post; but the chiefs of the Oreitans came to Alexander surrendering themselves and their nation. These he commanded to call together the bulk of the Oreitans and send them home, with the assurance that they would suffer no harm, as satrap over them he appointed Apollophanes. Together with him he left behind Leonnatus, the officer of the bodyguard, in the country of the Oreans with all the Agrianes, some of the archers and of the cavalry and a considerable body besides of Greek mercenary infantry and cavalry. Leonnatus was to await the fleet, until it made its voyage past this district, to build the city and to put everything in good order in the country of the Orestans, so that they might more diligently obey their satrap. Then he himself with the larger part of his army, for Hephaestion had arrived, with the party which had been left behind, proceeded towards the Gedrosians through country which for the most part was desert.

In this desert Aristobulus says that many myrrh trees grow, a good deal taller than the ordinary myrrh. The Phoenicians who followed the army as traders collected the gum of the myrrh, for it was abundant, coming from such large trunks and never having been gathered before, and loaded up their pack mules with it. This desert also has a root of spikenard plentiful and fragrant; this too the Phoenicians gathered a good deal of; it also was trodden underfoot by the army, and from such as was trodden there a delightful fragrance was wafted for some distance over the country, so abundant was it. There are also other trees in the desert, one with a leaf like laurel, and this grows in places which are washed by the sea; the trees are left high and dry by the receding tide, but when the tide returns, they appear growing in the sea.

of some, which grow in hollow places, the roots are always washed by the sea, where the water does not recede, and yet the tree is not spoiled by the sea water. The trees here are sometimes even thirty cubits high, and at that season they were in flower, the flower being very like a white violet, but of a very much sweeter perfume. There is also a thistle on a long stalk growing out of the soil, and the spike on this stalk is so strong that once and again when they were riding past it caught the rider's clothes, and pulled him from his horse rather than come away from its stalk. They say that the hares as they run through get their fur caught in the thistles, and so in fact are captured, just as birds with bird lime or fishes with hooks, but it was fairly easy to cut through with an axe; and the stalk of this thistle when cut gives out considerable juice more abundant and sharper to taste than that of figs in spring.

XXIII. From there Alexander went on through the country of the Gadrosians by a route both difficult and lacking in supplies, in especial, the army often found no water, but they were obliged to traverse a considerable part of the country by night, and at a greater distance from the sea; Alexander himself desiring to work along the sea-coast to see such harbours as there were and to get ready what conveniences were possible for the navy, either by digging wells, clearing open spaces, or preparing anchorages. But the Gadrosian country was entirely desert along the coast-line, so he sent Thoas son of Mandrodorus to the sea with a few cavalry, to see if there was any anchorage possible in this direction, or water near the sea, or any other necessary. And he returned and reported that he had found some fishermen on the beach in stifling cabins, made out of shells fixed together, and for a roofing the backbones of fishes, but that these fishermen used little fresh water, and this they dug from the gravel, and even that was not always fresh.

But when Alexander arrived at a certain place in Gadrosia where provisions were more plentiful, he distributed what he obtained among the baggage trains, and this he sealed with his own seal, and bade them convey it to the sea. But while he was going towards the halting-place from which the sea was nearest, the troops, making light of this seal—even the guards themselves—used these provisions and gave shares also to those most beset by hunger. So far were they overcome by their distress that they thought right to consider their obvious and immediate ruin before the yet uncertain and distant danger from their King. Indeed, Alexander, on learning of the grave necessity, pardoned the offenders. Then he by overrunning the district got together what provisions he could for the army which was sailing with the fleet, and sent Cretheus of Callatis to convoy it. The inhabitants also were commanded to bring down provisions from the upper districts, grinding as much corn as they could, with dates from the palm trees, and sheep for the army to purchase; and he sent Leonnatus also, one of the Companions, to another place with a small supply of ground corn.

XXIV Then Alexander advanced towards the Gedrosian capital; the district is called Pura, and he arrived there from the district of the Oreitans in a total of sixty days. Most of the histories of Alexander affirm that not even all the trials that his army endured in Asia were worthy to be compared with the miseries they suffered here. It was not because Alexander had no knowledge of the difficulty of the route that he went that way, as Nearchus says, who says so; but rather that he had heard that no one yet had successfully crossed through the way with an army, except that Semiramis had fled this way from India. The natives had a tradition that even she only escaped with twenty of her whole force, Cyrus also of Cambyses had got through with only seven survivors. For Cyrus did come into these parts intending to invade the country of India; but before he could do so he lost the greater part of his army by the barrenness and difficulty of the route. The relation of these stories to Alexander inspired him with emulation towards Cyrus and Semiramis. It was then on this account, and also that the fleet, being near by, might provide him with all necessaries, that, according to Nearchus, he chose this route. At any rate the heat of the sun beating down and the want of water destroyed a great part of the army, and especially of course the baggage animals, for they, from the depth of the sand and its heat, for it was burning, and the most part too from thirst, perished; for they even came across high hills of deep sand, not beaten down, but letting them sink in as if into liquid mud or into untrodden snow as they stepped upon it. Besides this, in ascents, or when descending, the horses and mules were particularly distressed by the unevenness and insecurity of the surface. Then the lengths of the marches very seriously oppressed the army; for want of water, which occurred at irregular intervals, drove them to make their marches as necessity dictated. Then whenever at night they covered the distance which had to be traversed, and at dawn came upon water, they were not so very much distressed, but if the day went on, by reason of the journey's length, and they were left still marching then indeed they were in a sorry plight from the double sufferings of heat and thirst.

XXV Of the transport animals there was then great loss, even caused deliberately by the army, for whenever their provisions began to fail them they clubbed together and gradually killed off most of their horses and mules and ate their flesh, giving out that they had perished from thirst or had collapsed from fatigue; and there was no one to prove the actual fact, both because of their distress and because they were all involved in the same crime. Alexander himself, however, was not unaware of these happenings, but he saw that the remedy for their present distress lay rather in his pretended ignorance than in any connivance of what went on. Nor was it easy to Καὶ οὗτοι οἱ μὲν τοσῳ κατὰ τὰς ὁδοὺς ὑπελείποντο, οἱ δὲ ὑπὸ καμάτου ἢ καυμάτου ἢ τῷ λιψῳ οὐκ ἀντέχοντες, καὶ οὔτε οἱ ἔχοντες ἦσαν οὔτε οἱ μένοντες θεραπεύσοντες· σπουδῇ γὰρ πολλῇ ἐγίγνετο ἡ στολος, καὶ ἐν τῷ ὕπνῳ τοῦ παντὸς προθυμῳ τὸ καθ' ἑκαστους ξυν ἀνάγκῃ ἡμαλεῖτο· οἱ δὲ καὶ ὕστερῳ κατοχοι κατὰ τὰς ὁδοὺς γιγνόμενοι, οἷα δὴ νυκτὸς τὸ πολυ τὰς πορειας ποιουμενοι, ἔπειτα ἐξαναστάντες, οἳς μὲν δυναμις ἔτι ἦν κατὰ τὰ ἴχνη τῆς στρατιας ἐφομαρτησαντες ὀλίγοι ἀπο πολλῶν ἐσωθησαν· οἱ πολλοὶ δὲ ὥσπερ ἐν πελαγει ἐπεσοντες τῇ ψαμμῳ ἀπωλοντο.

4 Ξυνηνέχθη δὲ τῇ στρατιᾷ καὶ ἄλλο πάθημα, ὃ δὴ οὐχ ἥκιστα ἐπίεσεν αὐτούς τε καὶ τοὺς ἵππους καὶ τὰ ὑποζυγια. Ἔστι γὰρ ἡ Γαδρωσίων γῆ ὑπ' ἀνέμων τῶν ἐτησιων, καθαπερ οὖν καὶ ἡ Ἰνδῶν γῆ, οὐ τὰ πεδια τῶν Γαδρωσίων, ἀλλὰ τὰ ὄρη, ὑπαπερ προσφερονται τε αἱ νεφελαι ἐκ τοῦ πνευματος καὶ ἀναχεονται, οὐχ ὑπερβαλλουσαι τῶν ὀρῶν τὰς κορυφας. being along those of the troops who were sick nor those who were left lying in the way from fatigue both from want of the transport animals and because the men themselves kept destroying the waggons which it was impossible to drag along owing to the depth of the sand and also because in the earlier marches they had been compelled for this reason not to go by the shortest routes but by those that were easiest for the teams. And so some were left behind on the routes sick and others from weariness or sunstroke or no longer able to hold out against the thirst, there was no one to help them forward and no one to stay behind and take care of them, for the march was hurried and in the general eagerness the troubles of individuals were necessarily neglected and those who were borne down by sleep on the marches since they made most of their stages by night, when they woke up again if they had strength to do so followed in the track of the army and so a few out of many were saved but most of them fell into the sand, like men who perished in the sea.

The army received also a further disaster which perhaps more than anything else distressed both the troops, and their horses and transport animals. During the trade winds there is heavy rain over the land of the Gadrosians as also over India but so much over the Gadrosian plains as over the hills, whether the clouds are borne by the wind and are poured out in rain not rising above the crests of the hills. Now the army happened near a small stream, a fact for the sake of the water and about the second watch of the night the stream which flowed here became swollen with rains, the rains themselves having fallen out of sight of the army and came down with so great a spate of water that it drowned most of the women and children from among those which followed the army, swept away all the royal pavilion and its contents, and so many of the transport animals as had survived, and indeed the troops themselves were only saved with great difficulty, with their weapons only and not even all of these. Then again most of those even who drank, whenever they met with abundant water after much drought and thirst, perished by reason of their intemperate drinking, and for this reason Alexander did not, as a rule, have his encampment actually on the banks of the watercourses, but about twenty stades away, so that they should not, by a general rush at the stream, perish, themselves and their beasts, and at the same time the greediest of them, stepping into the springs or streams, spoil the water for the rest of the host.

XXVI At this point I have not thought well to leave unrecorded the noblest achievement of Alexander, whether it took place in this country, or among the Parapamisadae at an earlier date, as others have narrated. The army was marching through sand and while the heat was already burning, since they were obliged to reach water at the end of the march, and this was some distance ahead. Alexander himself was much distressed by thirst, and with much difficulty, but still as best he could, led the way on foot, so that the rest of the troops should (as usually happens in such a case) bear their toils more easily, when all are sharing the distress alike. Meanwhile some of the light armed troops had turned aside from the rest of the line to look for water, and had found some, just a little water collected in a shallow riverbed, a poor and wretched water-hole, they gathered up this water with difficulty and hurried to Alexander as if they were bringing him some great boon, but when they drew near, they brought the water, which they had poured into a helmet, to the King. He received it, and thanked those who had brought it, and taking it poured it out in the sight of all the troops, and at this action the whole army was so much heartened that you would have said that each and every man had drunk that water which Alexander thus poured out. This deed of Alexander's above all I commend most warmly as a proof both of his endurance and his experience as a general.

There was also a further incident which happened to the army in this district. The guides of the route finally said that they could not remember the way, but that its marks of direction had been obliterated by the violence of the wind, and, of course, in the sand which was everywhere and all alike, heaped up on all sides, there was nothing by which one could guess the road, not even the ordinary trees growing along it, nor any solid hillock emerging from it, nor had the guides accustomed themselves to make their marches by the stars at night nor by the sun during the day, as the Phoenician sailors have become accustomed to steer their way by the Little Bear and the rest of mankind by the Great Bear. So Alexander, understanding that they ought to lead the army inclining to the left, took a few horsemen with him and rode on ahead, and when their horses began to weary beneath the heat, he left behind most of XXVII Arriving at length at the Gadrosian capital, Alexander rested his army there. Apollophanes he removed from his satrapy, finding that he had neglected all his orders, and he appointed Thoas to be satrap in his stead, but as he died of sickness, Sibyrtius received the office, he had been recently appointed by Alexander satrap of Carmania, but now he was given the charge of both the Arachotians and the Gadrosians, and Tlepolemus son of Pythophanes took over Carmania. Alexander had already begun his march towards Carmania, when it was reported to him that Philip the satrap of the Indians had been treacherously killed as the result of a plot against him by the mercenaries; but that the Macedonian bodyguards of Philip had put to death the assassins, some in the act, and some they captured afterwards. On learning this he despatched letters to India to Eudamus and Taxiles bidding them take charge of the district formerly under Philip, until he should send a satrap to govern it.

When Alexander had reached Carmania, Craterus

arrived, bringing with him the rest of the army and the elephants and Ordanes who had revolted and began to rebel, but whom he had captured. There also Stasanor satrap of Areia and the satrap of the Zarangians came, and with them Phariamanes the son of Phrataphernes the satrap of Parthyaea and Hyrcania. There arrived also the satraps who had been left behind with Parmenio in charge of the forces in Media, Cleander and Sitalces and Heracon, they also bringing the greater part of these forces. Both the natives and the forces themselves brought many charges against Cleander and Sitalces and their followers of having plundered temples, removed ancient tombs, and done other overbearing and scandalous injustices to the inhabitants. On receiving this report, Alexander put these two to death, to put fear into any other satraps or governors who were left, that if they committed the like crimes they too should suffer the like fate. And this above everything else kept in order the tribes which Alexander had subdued or which had surrendered to him, being as they were so many in number, and so far separated one from another—namely, that Alexander permitted no subjects under his sway to be wronged by their rulers. Heracon indeed was for the time acquitted of the charge, but soon after the charge was brought home to him by some of the people of Susa of having sacked the temple of Susa, and he also was punished. The companions of Stasanor and Phrataphernes brought to Alexander a large number of transport animals and a good many camels, having guessed as soon as they learned that he was going towards Gedrosia that his army would suffer those very disasters which it did suffer. Their coming, too, was indeed timely, as was that of the camels and other animals, for Alexander distributed them all to the officers, one by one, to the others by squadrons and centuries, and also by fives, according to the total number of camels and transport animals which he received.

XXVIII. Some writers have recounted a story, which I do not myself credit, that Alexander bound together two war chariots and reclining at ease with his Companions and soothed by the sounds of the flute, thus drove through Carmania, his army following behind, garlanded and sporting, that provisions, and everything else that could make for luxury, had been brought together along their path by the Carmanians, and that all this had been conceived by Alexander in mimicry of the bacchic revelry of Dionysus, since there was a story about Dionysus, too, that after subduing India he traversed in this guise the greater part of Asia, Dionysus himself being surnamed Triumph, and his warlike processions after his victories called, for the same reason, triumphs. All this neither Ptolemaeus son of Lagus nor Aristobulus son of Aristobulus have recorded, nor any other author whom one might regard as reliable in narrating events like these. As for me, it has sufficed to write them down here, but merely as legends. This, however, I do record, following Aristobulus, that Alexander in Carmania sacrificed thank-offerings for his conquest of India, and on behalf of his army, for its safe transit through

Meanwhile Nearchus, having completed his voyage round the country of the Oreitans and the Gadrosians and the Ichthyophagi put in to the inhabited part of the Carmanian seashore; and thence sailing again with only a few of his men reported to Alexander the result of his voyage through the outer ocean. Alexander sent him back again, to continue his voyage to the district of Susis and the mouths of the river Tigris. The story, however of his voyage from the river Indus to the Persian Sea and the mouth of the Tigris, I shall recount separately, using Nearchus himself as my authority, so that this may also be a History of Alexander in Greek. This, then shall be perhaps for some future date, when occasion and circumstances put me in the way of it.

Alexander now despatched Hephaestion with the greatest part of the army and the baggage train, and with the elephants also, along the sea-coast from Carmania, bidding him lead his force to Persia, because, his expedition taking place in winter, the seaward parts of Persia were sunny and well supplied with all necessaries.

XXIX Then Alexander himself with the lightest of the infantry and the cavalry Companions and with part of the archers, advanced by the road leading to the Pasargadae, in Persia, Stasanor he despatched to his own country And when he was on the Persian borders, he did not find Phrasaortes satrap any longer, for he had died of sickness while Alexander was in India, but Orsines had charge of Persia, not by appointment of Alexander, but because he felt that he was the right person, in the absence of any other governor, to keep Persia in order for Alexander To the district of the Pasargadae came also Atropates the satrap of Media, with Baryaxes a Mede as prisoner, since he had worn his cap in the upright fashion and given himself out to be King of Persians and Medes; together with him were his associates in his revolution and rebellion. All these Alexander ordered to be put to death.

Alexander, however, was most distressed by the crime committed against the tomb of Cyrus and Cambyses, since as Aristobulus relates) he found the tomb of Cyrus broken into and rifled The tomb of this Cyrus was in the territory of the Pasargadae, in the royal park, round it had been planted a grove of all sorts of trees, the grove was irrigated, and deep grass had grown in the meadow, the tomb itself was built, at the base, with stones cut square and raised into rectangular form. Above, there was a chamber with a stone roof and with a door leading into it so narrow that with difficulty, and after great trouble, one man, and he a small one, could enter. And in the chamber was placed a golden sarcophagus, in which Cyrus' body had been buried, a divan stood by the sarcophagus, and this divan had feet of wrought gold, its coverlet was of Babylonian carpets, and for an undercovering, purple rugs. Upon it was placed a tunic and vests also of Babylonian workmanship. Then there were, besides, Median trousers, and robes dyed blue lay there, as he says,[1] and furthermore some of purple, some of this colour, some of that, necklaces also and scimitars and earrings of stones set in gold, and a table stood there also. It was on the midst of the divan that the sarcophagus, containing Cyrus' body, was placed. Within the enclosure, and lying on the approach to the tomb itself was a small building put up for the Magians, who were guardians of Cyrus' tomb, from as long ago as Cambyses, son of Cyrus, receiving this guardianship from father to son. To them was given from the King a sheep a day, an allowance of meal and wine, and a horse each month, to sacrifice to Cyrus. There was an inscription on the tomb in Persian letters; it ran thus, in Persian: "Mortal, I am Cyrus son of Cambyses, who founded the Persian empire, and was Lord of Asia. Grudge me not, then, my monument."

But Alexander, who was anxious, as soon as he should conquer Persia, to visit Cyrus' tomb, finds everything else removed except the sarcophagus and the divan. The robbers had even violated the body of Cyrus for they had removed the top of the sarcophagus and had thrown out the body, the sarcophagus itself they had tried to render portable, so that they might bear it away chipping some parts away and breaking other parts off. But succeeding in this attempt, however they left the sarcophagus as it was and went off. And Aristobulus says that he received orders from Alexander to put the tomb in good order again, to deposit such parts of the body as were left in the sarcophagus again, and place its lid upon it, where it was damaged, to repair it, to spread the divan with ribands, and to restore, just like the originals, all else that had been placed there, by way of ornament, piece by piece, to obliterate the door both by walling it up in stone and partly by covering it with clay, and then to set on the clay the royal seal. Alexander then seized the Magians who were the guardians of the tomb and tortured them that they might reveal the perpetrators, but they even under torture accused neither themselves nor anyone else, nor showed in any way that they were privy to the deed, and so Alexander let them go.

XXX. Thence Alexander advanced to the Persian palace to which he himself had formerly set fire, that act when I related, I could not approve, nor did Alexander when he returned thither approve it. Furthermore, many accusations were brought by the Persians against Orxines, who took command of Persia when Phrasaortes died. Orxines was convicted of having rifled temples and royal tombs, and also of having put to death many Persians without cause. Certain persons then under Alexander's orders hanged him. As satrap of the Persians he appointed Peucestas the bodyguard, regarding him as especially loyal to him, and chiefly on account of his heroism among the Mallians, where he risked his life and helped to save Alexander, and moreover, by reason of his Oriental way of life he was not unsuited to the Persians. And of this he gave proof, as soon as he was appointed satrap of Persia, by adopting, alone of the Macedonians, the Median dress and learning the Persian language, and in all other respects assimilating himself to the Persian ways. For all this Alexander commended him, and the Persians were gratified that he preferred their ways to those of his own country

BOOK VII

I On reaching the Pasargadae and Persepolis Alexander was seized with a desire to sail down by the Euphrates and Tigris into the Persian Sea, and to see the outlets of these rivers into the sea, as he had seen the outlet of the Indus, and the ocean near it. Some historians have recorded that Alexander intended to sail round Arabia, the greater part of it, and Aethiopia and Libya and the Nomads who are beyond Mount Atlas, right up to Gadeira in our sea, then if he had subdued Libya and Carchedon, he would in just right be called King of all Asia, for, of course, the Persian and Median Kings had not held sway over even a fraction of Asia, and so had no right to call themselves Great Kings. Thence some authorities say he proposed to sail into the Euxine Sea to Scythia and Lake Maeotis, others, that he intended to make for Sicily and the Iapygian promontory; for he was already rather distressed that the Roman name was growing very widely extended.

As for what was in Alexander's mind, I for my part have no means of conjecturing with any accuracy, nor do I care to guess; this, however, I think I can for my own part asseverate, that Alexander had no small or mean conceptions, nor would ever have remained contented with any of his possessions so far, not even if he had added Europe to Asia, and the Britannic islands to Europe, but would always have searched far beyond for something unknown, being always the rival, if of no other, yet of himself. In this connection I applaud the Indian wise men, some of whom, the story goes, were found by Alexander in the open air in a meadow, where they used to have their disputations, and who, when they saw Alexander and his army, did nothing further than beat with their feet the ground on which they stood. Then when Alexander enquired by interpreters what this action of theirs meant, they replied "O King Alexander, each man possesses just so much of the earth as this on which we stand, and you being a man like other men, save that you are full of activity and relentless, are roaming over all this earth far from your home, troubled yourself, and troubling others. But not so long hence you will die, and will possess just so much of the earth as suffices for your burial."

11 On that occasion Alexander applauded their remarks and the speakers, but he always acted diametrically opposite to that which he then applauded. For example, he is said to have expressed surprise at Diogenes of Sinope, when he found Diogenes once on the Isthmus lying in the sun; he and his bodyguard and his infantry Companions halted, and he asked if Diogenes had need of anything. But he merely answered that he needed nothing else, but bade him and his followers stand out of his sunlight. So it was evident that Alexander was not incapable of higher thought, but he was, in fact, grievously under the sway of ambition. For once when he came to Taxila and saw those of the Indian wise men who go naked he desired very much that one of these men should join him, since he so much admired their endurance. On this the oldest among these wise men, whose pupils the others were called Dandamis, said that he would not join Alexander, and would not permit any of his school to do so. For he is said to have replied that he was just as much a son of Zeus himself as Alexander was and that he had no need of anything from Alexander since he was contented with what he had. He perceived, moreover, that those who were wandering about with Alexander over all those countries and seas were none the better for it, and that there was no end to their many wanderings. He did not then desire anything that Alexander could give him, nor did he fear being kept out of anything of which Alexander might be possessed. While he lived the land of India was all he needed, giving to him its fruits in their season, and when he died he would merely be released from an uncomfortable companion his body. Alexander then hearing this reply had no mind to compel him, realizing that the man was indeed free. But a certain Calanus, as Megasthenes writes, one of the wise men of these parts, was persuaded to join Alexander, a man whom the wise men themselves regarded as most unrestrained in his desires, reproaching Calanus because he deserted the happiness which they had, while he served a master other than God.

III All this I have narrated because it was impossible to write a history of Alexander without mention of Calanus for he grew enfeebled in body in Persia, though he had never been ill before, and yet he would not submit to the ordinary treatment of an invalid, but said to Alexander that he was glad to make an end as he was before he should experience any suffering which would force him to adopt a different treatment than that to which he had been used Alexander, however argued with him at some length but perceiving that Calanus would not give in but would choose some other way of death if one should not yield to him on this point, ordered, as Calanus desired that a pyre should be built for him and that Ptolemaeus son of Lagus the officer of the bodyguard should be in charge of this Some authorities relate that he had a great procession formed, horses and men, of whom some were in full armour and then carried all sorts of incense for the pyre others again say that they carried gold and silver cups and royal raiment For Calanus himself a horse was made ready, since he could not walk by reason of his illness, and yet he could not so much as mount the horse, but was borne upon a litter lying down, crowned with garlands in the Indian fashion and singing songs in the Indian tongue The Indians say that these songs were hymns to some gods, and their praises The horse, on which he was to have mounted, was a royal horse belonging to the Nysaeans and before Calanus mounted the pyre it was given as a gift to Lysimachus, one of those who had been his pupils in philosophy, and of the cups and coverlets which Alexander had ordered to be heaped upon the pyre, he gave some to one and some to another of his followers. Thus, then, he mounted the pyre and lay down with solemnity in the sight of all the host. As for Alexander, he felt this spectacle to be unseemly, with one for whom he had an affection, as for the rest, they felt nothing but astonishment to see that Calanus flinched not one whit in the flames. And when the pyre was lit by those detailed to do so, the trumpets (says Nearchus) sounded as Alexander had ordered, and the whole army raised the cry which they raise when entering battle, and the elephants trumpeted their shrill war-cry in honour of Calanus. Many writers have told this story, and others like it, of Calanus the Indian, not altogether valueless to mankind, at least for anyone who cares to examine how stalwart and unflinching is human resolution to carry out that which it desires.

4 1 At this time Alexander despatched Atropates to his satrapy, after he had himself proceeded to Susa. There he arrested Abuletes and his son Oxathres since he had abused his office as governor of the Susians, and put them to death. For there had been many irregularities on the part of those rulers of countries which Alexander had captured in war, whether towards temples, tombs, or the subjects themselves, since the King had been a long time on his Indian expedition, and there seemed little likelihood of his returning safe from so many tribes and so many fighting elephants, doomed to perish beyond the Indus, Hydaspes, Acesines, and Hyphasis. The disasters too which he suffered in Gedrosia all the more encouraged the satraps on this side to scout any idea of his return. Not but what Alexander himself is said to have grown at this time more ready to listen to any accusations, as if they were wholly reliable, and to punish severely those who were convicted of slight errors, because he felt they might, in the same frame of mind, commit heavier crimes.

Then he held also weddings at Susa, both his own and for his Companions, he married Darius' eldest daughter Barsine,[1] and, as Aristobulus says, another wife besides the youngest daughter of Ochus, Parysatis. He had already taken to wife Roxane the daughter of Oxyartes the Bactrian. To Hephaestion he gave Drypetis, also a daughter of Darius, sister to his own wife, for he desired that Hephaestion's children should be his own nephews and nieces, to Craterus, Amastrine daughter of Oxyartes, Darius' brother, to Perdiccas a daughter of Atropates, the satrap of Media, to Ptolemaeus the officer of the bodyguard and Eumenes the royal secretary the daughters of Artabazus, Artacama to Ptolemaeus, Artonis to Eumenes, to Nearchus the daughter of Barsine[2] and Mentor, to Seleucus the daughter of Spitamenes the Bactrian, and similarly to the other Companions the noblest daughters of Persians and Medes, to the number of eighty. These weddings were solemnised in the Persian fashion, chairs were placed for the bridegrooms in order, then after the health-drinkings the brides came in, and each sat down by the side of her bridegroom, they took them by the hand and kissed them, the King setting the example, for all the weddings took place together. In this, if ever, Alexander was thought to have shown a spirit of condescension and comradeship. Then the bridegrooms having received their brides led them back to their homes, and to all Alexander gave dowries. Any other Macedonians who had married Asian women Alexander ordered to be struck off the army list, and they proved to be more than ten thousand, and to all Alexander gave wedding gifts.

V. This seemed a convenient moment to clear up all debts of the army, and Alexander ordered a list to be made of all debts, with a promise of settlement. At first only a few entered their names on the list, being nervous lest Alexander had merely tried an experiment to see who had not lived on their pay and who had been living extravagantly, but when Alexander learnt that most of the soldiers were not sending in their names, but concealing their bonds, he reproved the suspicions of the troops, the King, he said, must always speak truth to his subjects and the subjects must never suppose that their king speaks anything but truth. So he had banking tables set up in the camp, with money thereon, and told the accountants charged with the distribution to cancel the debts to all who produced any bond, without so much as registering the names. So they came to believe that Alexander spoke truth, and they were more gratified by the concealment of their names than by the cancellation of the debts. This gift of his to the army is said to have amounted to twenty thousand talents.

He gave also various other gifts, according to the repute in which anyone was held, or to valour shown conspicuously in dangers. He also decorated with golden crowns those distinguished for bravery—Peucestas, first, who saved his life, then Leonnatus, who did likewise, and also for his risks run in India and his victory among the Orians, and because he faced, with the forces remaining to him, the rebel Orreians and their neighbours, and beat them in the battle, and also for all his other dispositions which he had satisfactorily made among the Orians. Then, besides, he decorated Nearchus for his coasting voyage from India by way of the ocean, for Nearchus also had now arrived at Susa; and next, Onesicritus, the helmsman of the royal ship; also Hephaestion and the rest of the bodyguards.

VI. Then there came to him also the governors of the new cities which he had founded, and of the provinces he had captured besides, bringing about thirty thousand youths, all of the same age, whom Alexander called his "Successors," all dressed in Macedonian dress and trained to warlike exercises on the Macedonian system. Their arrival is said to have annoyed the Macedonians, as if Alexander was contriving every means of dispensing with Macedonians in future. In fact they had long been pained to see Alexander wearing the Median robes, and his Persian marriage ceremonies had not given satisfaction to most of them—indeed, not even to some of the bridegrooms, though they had been highly honoured by their being thus raised to a level with the King. Then they were not pleased that Peucestas the satrap of Persia was using Persian ways both in dress and speech and more, that Alexander seemed to like his Oriental habits then again, Bactrian, Sogdian, and Arachotian cavalry, and Zarangaean, Areian, Parthyaean, and of the Persians those called the Evacae were brigaded with the Companion Cavalry (that is, those who seemed even, now for handsomeness or some other nice point. Then, too, apart from these, a fifth cavalry regiment was added (not entirely Oriental, but the whole cavalry force being increased, some of the Orientals were specially picked for it), into the special squadron were enrolled Cophen the son of Artabazus[1] and Hydarnes and Artibelus sons of Mazaeus, Staines and Pharnabazus, sons of Phratapherues the satrap of Parthyaea and Hyrcania and Hystanes son of Otyartes and brother of Roxane, Alexander's wife. Autobares also, and his brother Mithrobarzus, and as commander over all these was appointed Hystaspes the Bactrian, and they were given Macedonian spears (instead of the Oriental javelins). All this caused indignation to the Macedonians, as giving an idea that Alexander's heart was growing entirely Orientalized, and that he paid little consideration to Macedonian customs and Macedonians themselves.

VII. Alexander now gave orders to Hephaestion to take the greater portion of the infantry force to the Persian Sea. Then, his fleet having put in to Susian territory, he himself embarked with his bodyguards and the special squadron of cavalry, and also taking on board a few of the Companions' cavalry, he sailed down the river Eulaeus to the sea. And being now not far from the estuary he left there most of his ships, and those which were in a bad way, and himself with the faster sailers coasted by sea from the river Eulaeus towards the mouths of the Tigris; and the rest of his flotilla, sailing up the Eulaeus as far as the canal cut between the Tigris and Eulaeus, in this way sailed into the Tigris.

Now, of these two rivers, the Euphrates and the Tigris, which are the boundaries of so much of Syria as lies between them—and hence the name Mesopotamia is given to it by the inhabitants—the Tigris, which runs through much lower ground, receives many canals from the Euphrates, and also takes in many tributaries besides, and being much increased in volume thereby runs into the Persian ocean, a large river, and not to be forded at any point up to its mouth, since no portion of it whatever is spent upon the land. For here the country is all higher than the river, and the Tigris therefore loses none of its stream to any other river, by means of canals, but rather receives them into itself, and hence it does not permit irrigation of its country from its own waters. The Euphrates, however, runs on a higher valley-bed, its stream runs flush with its land, all along its course, and many canals have been cut from it, some always running—and from these those who live on either side get their water—others, however, they make only as need dictates, whenever the ground grows thirsty, to irrigate the land, for the greater part of this territory receives no rain; and thus the Euphrates finishes with a diminished stream, and that too spread over marshy land.

Alexander now sailed round by sea the distance of the shore of the Persian gulf between the Euaeus and the Tigris, and then sailed up the Tigris to the camp where Hephaestion had encamped with all his force. Thence again he sailed to Opis, a city built on the Tigris. During this voyage upstream he removed the weirs in the river and made the stream level throughout, these weirs had been made by the Persians to prevent anyone sailing up to their country overmastering it by a naval force. All this had been contrived by the Persians, inexpert as they were in maritime matters, and so these weirs, built up at frequent intervals, made the voyage up the Tigris very difficult. Alexander, however, said that contrivances of this kind belonged to those who had no military supremacy, he therefore regarded these safeguards as of no value to himself, and indeed proved them not worth mention by destroying with ease these labours of the Persians.

VIII On reaching Opis, Alexander summoned his Macedonians and announced that those who from old age or from mutilations were unfit for service he there discharged from the army, and he sent them to their own homes. He promised to give them on departure enough to make them objects of greater envy to those at home, and also stir up the rest of the Macedonians to a zeal for sharing his own dangers and toils. Alexander for his part said this, no doubt, to flatter the Macedonians, they however, seeing that Alexander rather despised them, by this time, and regarded them as altogether useless for warfare, quite naturally, for their part, were annoyed at his remarks, having been annoyed during the whole campaign with a great deal else since he caused them indignation frequently by his Persian dress which seemed to point the same way and the Macedonian equipment of the Oriental Successors and the importation of cavalry of foreign tribes into the ranks of the Companions. They did not then restrain themselves and keep silence but called upon him to release them all from the army and bade him carry on war with the help of his sire by which title they hinted slightingly at Ammon. When then Alexander heard this for he had grown worse tempered at that time and Oriental subservience had rendered him less disposed than before to the Macedonians he leapt down from the platform with the officers that were about him, and bade them arrest the foremost of those who had disturbed the multitude, himself with his finger pointing out to the guards whom they were to arrest, they were in number thirteen. These he ordered to be marched off to die, but as the others, amazed, remained in dead silence, he remounted the platform and spoke thus.

IX. "I now propose to speak, Macedonians, not with a view to checking your homeward impulse, so far as I am concerned, you may go where you will, but that you may know, if you do so go away, how you have behaved to us, and how we have behaved to you. First then I shall begin my speech with my father Philip, as is right and proper. For Philip found you vagabonds and helpless, most of you clothed with sheepskins, pasturing a few sheep on the mountain sides and fighting for these, with ill success, against Illyrians and Triballians, and the Thracians on your borders. Philip gave you cloaks to wear, in place of sheepskins, brought you down from the hills to the plains, made you doughty opponents of your neighbouring enemies, so that you trusted now not so much to the natural strength of your villages as to your own courage. Nay, he made you dwellers of cities, and civilised you with good laws and customs. Then of those very tribes to whom you submitted, and by whom you and your goods were harried, he made you masters, no longer slaves and subjects, and he added most of Thrace to Macedonia, and seizing the most convenient coast towns, opened up commerce to your country, and enabled you to work your mines in peace. Then he made you overlords of the Thracians, before whom you had long died of terror, and humbling the Phocians, made the high-road into Greece broad and easy for you, whereas it had been narrow and difficult. Athens and Thebes, always watching their chance to destroy Macedon, he so completely humbled—ourselves by this time sharing these his labours—that instead of our paying tribute to Athens and obeying Thebes, they had to win from us in turn their right to exist. Then he passed into the Peloponnese, and put all in due order there, and now being declared overlord of all the rest of Greece for the expedition against Persia, he won this new prestige not so much for himself as for all Macedonia.

"All these noble deeds of my father towards you are great indeed, if looked at by themselves, and yet small, if compared with ours. I inherited from my father a few gold and silver cups, and not so much as sixty talents in his treasure; and of debts owed by Philip as much as five hundred talents, and yet having myself borrowed over and above these another eight hundred, I set forth from that country which hardly maintained you in comfort and at once opened to you the strait of the Hellespont, though the Persians were then masters of the sea; then, crushing with my cavalry Darius' satraps, I added to your empire all Ionia, all Aeolia, Upper and Lower Phrygia, and Lydia; Miletus I took by siege; all else I took by surrender and gave to you to reap the fruits thereof. [1] μᾶλλον—here Krüger and others mark a lacuna; but we have already seen Arrian often illogical through brachylogy, though he is usually verbose.

potamia are your own possessions, Babylon is yours, Bactria, and Susa, the wealth of Lydia, the treasures of Persia, the good things of India, the outer ocean, all are yours, you are satraps, you guards, you captains. So what is left for myself from all these toils save the purple and this diadem? I have taken nothing to myself, nor can anyone show treasures of mine, save these possessions of yours, or what is being safeguarded for you. For there is nothing as concerns myself for which I should reserve them, since I eat the same food that you eat, and have such sleep as you have—and yet I hardly think that I do eat the same food as some of you, who live delicately, I know, moreover, that I wake before you, that you may sleep quietly in your beds.

X. "Yet you may feel that while you were enduring the toils and distresses, I have acquired all this without toil and without distress. But who of you is conscious of having endured more toil for me than I for him? Or see here, let any who carries wounds strip himself and show them, I too will show mine. For I have no part of my body, in front at least, that is left without scars; there is no weapon, used at close quarters, or hurled from afar, of which I do not carry the mark. Nay, I have been wounded by the sword, hand to hand, I have been shot with arrows, I have been struck from a catapult, smitten many a time with stones and clubs, for you, for your glory, for your wealth; I lead you conquerors through

Moreover, if any had debts, I, being no busybody to enquire how they were made, when you were winning so much pay, and acquiring so much plunder, whenever there was plunder after a siege I have canceled them all. And further, golden coronals are reminders to the most part of you, both of your bravery and of my high regard—reminders that will never perish. Whosoever has died, his death has been glorious, and splendid has been his burial. To most of them there stand at home brazen statues, their parents are held in esteem, and have been freed from all services and taxes. For while I have led you, not one of you has fallen in flight.

This, when you declare it, will be, no doubt, glorious among men, and pious in the sight of heaven. Begone!"

XI When Alexander had finished he leapt down swiftly from his platform and passed into the palace, and paid no attention to his bodily needs nor was seen by any of the Companions, and, indeed, not even on the day following. But on the third day he summoned within the picked men among the Persians, and divided among them the command of the different brigades, and permitted only those who were next his relatives to give him the customary kiss. The Macedonians however were at the time much moved on hearing his speech, and remained in silence there, around the platform: yet no one followed the King when he departed save his personal Companions and the bodyguards, but the mass neither while remaining there had anything to do or say nor were willing to depart. But when they heard about the Persians and the Medes and the handing of commands to the Persians and the Oriental force being drafted into the various ranks, and a Persian squadron called by a Macedonian name and of Persian infantry Companions, and others too, and a Persian company of "silver-shields," and "cavalry of the Companions," and a new royal squadron even of this, they could no longer contain, but running all together to the palace they threw their arms before the doors as signs of supplication to the King; they themselves standing shouting before the doors begging to be let in. The instigators of the late disturbance, and those who began the cry, they said they would give up, in fact they would depart from the doors neither day nor night unless Alexander would have some pity on them

When this was reported to Alexander, he at once came out, and seeing them so humble, and hearing most of the number crying and lamenting, he also shed tears Then he came forward as if to speak, and they continued beseeching And one of them, a notable officer of the Companions' cavalry both by age and rank, called Callines, said thus "This, O King, is what grieves the Macedonians, that you have made Persians your kinsmen and Persians are called 'Alexander's kinsmen,' and they are permitted to kiss you, but no Macedonian has tasted this privilege" On this Alexander broke in: "But all of you I regard as my kinsmen, and so from henceforth I call you." When thus he had spoken, Callines approached and kissed him, and any other who desired to kiss him And thus they took up their arms again and returned shouting and singing their victory song to the camp. But Alexander in gratitude for this sacrificed to the gods to whom he was wont to sacrifice, and gave a general feast, sitting himself there, and all the Macedonians sitting round him, and then next to them Persians, and next any of the other tribes who had precedence in reputation or any other quality, and he himself and his comrades drank from the same bowl and poured the same libations, while the Greek seers and the Magians began the ceremony. And Alexander prayed for all sorts of blessings, and especially for harmony and fellowship in the empire between Macedonians and Persians. They say that those who shared the feast were nine thousand, and that they all poured the same libation and thereat sang the one song of victory.

XII Then at their own wish such of the Macedonians as were unfit for service from old age or any accident departed from him, they numbered about ten thousand. To these Alexander gave the pay due not only for their expired time but also for the time spent in reaching home. Above the pay he gave also a gratuity to each of a talent. Then if there were children of Asian wives he bade them leave these behind, and not make trouble in Macedonia between foreigners and children of foreign wives and the children and mothers they had left behind them; he promised to care for them that they might be trained up in Macedonian ways, being especially disciplined in military training; then, when they were grown to manhood he would take them back himself to Macedonia and hand them over to their fathers. All this he promised as they went away, rather vague and uncertain as it was, but as the most solid proof of his good-will and affection towards them he thought good to add this, that he sent with them as guardian and guide of their journey Craterus, his most loyal follower, whom he loved as dearly as his own life So then having bidden them all farewell, with tears in his eyes, and they with tears in theirs, he dismissed them But he bade Craterus conduct them, and when he had brought them safe home, to take charge of Macedonia, Thrace, and Thessaly, and the freedom of Greece Then he ordered Antipater to bring drafts of Macedonians of full age to replace those that were being sent home He despatched also Polysperchon with Craterus, who was the officer next in seniority to Craterus, so that in case of harm coming to Craterus on the way, since he sent him as an invalid, the travellers should not lack a leader.

But some dim rumour of this kind was going about among those who publish abroad the affairs of kings, all the more eagerly the more they are kept secret, and also wrest ambiguous statements to the worse interpretation, where mere probability and their own malice lead them, rather than to the truth, namely, that Alexander already coming under the spell of his mother's calumnies, which she heaped upon Antipater, was anxious to remove Antipater from Macedonia. But I suggest that this recall of Antipater was not meant to disgrace him, but that no mutual unpleasantness might arise out of their disagreement, which perhaps Alexander himself could not heal. Since they never ceased writing letters to Alexander, Antipater about the headstrong nature of Olympias, and her sharp temper, and her interfering ways, very unfitting to the mother of Alexander, so that a chance remark of Alexander's was bandied about, in reference to the news of his mother's doings, that his mother was exacting a heavy price from him for her ten months' housing of him, while Olympias accused Antipater of being arrogant from his position and the respect to which it entitled him, and of forgetting him who had placed him there, but rather expecting to assume every kind of precedence among the other Macedonians and Greeks. And this aspect evidently gathered strength with Alexander, that is, whatever tended to Antipater's discredit, as being more dreaded to royalty. And yet no open deed or word was recorded of Alexander which might have led one to conclude that Antipater was not as high as ever in his regard.

XIII. Hephaestion, they say, influenced by these sayings became reconciled to Eumenes, Eumenes being willing, but himself not. It is on this journey that Alexander is said to have seen the plain in which the royal mares were pastured, the plain itself was called the Plain of Nysa and the horses were called Nysaean, as Herodotus tells us, and there were originally upwards of a hundred and fifty thousand mares, but Alexander found then not above fifty thousand, for most of them had been driven off by robbers.

There they say that Atropates the satrap of Media handed over to him a hundred women, saying that they were of the Amazons; they were equipped like cavalry troopers, except that they carried axes instead of spears, and small targets instead of shields. Some say that they had the right breast smaller, and that this was uncovered in battle. Alexander sent them away from the army, lest they should meet any roughness from the Macedonians or foreign troops, but he bade them announce to their queen that he was coming to see her in hope of offspring. This, however, neither Aristobulus nor Ptolemaeus nor any other reliable author on such matters has recorded. I do not myself think that the race of Amazons survived so long, indeed, before Alexander's time Xenophon made no reference to them, though he referred to Phasians and Colchians and other foreign races which the Greeks met either when starting from Trebizond or before they reached Trebizond, where they certainly would have met Amazons if there had still been any. And yet I do not think it credible that this race of women, so often mentioned by good authorities, never existed at all; since Heracles is reputed to have been sent to them, and to have brought back to Greece the girdle of Hippolyte their queen, it is said also that the Athenians with Theseus first defeated in battle and repelled these women when invading Europe, and Cimon painted the battle of the Athenians and Amazons just as he did the battle of the Greeks and Persians. Then Herodotus has often mentioned these women, and all the Athenians who pronounce eulogies on those who fell in war, and made especial mention of the Athenian action against the Amazons. And if Atropates showed to Alexander any feminine cavalry, I think they were some other foreign women taught to ride whom he exhibited got up in the traditional Amazon fashion.

XIV At Ecbatana Alexander offered a sacrifice, as he usually did after some successful event, and held also an athletic and literary contest and held drinking bouts with the Companions. During this time Hephaestion fell ill, and his illness had now run seven days, and they say that the race-course was filled with people, for there were athletic sports that day for boys: but when Alexander heard that Hephaestion was seriously ill, he left the course and hurried to him, but found him no longer living.

At this point historians have given varied accounts of Alexander's grief. That his mourning was great, all have related, as to his actions, historians differ, according to the good-will or the ill-will felt towards Hephaestion or indeed towards Alexander himself. Of these, those who have recounted scandals appear to me partly to have thought that all redounds to Alexander's credit that he did or said in his excess of grief for one who was of all men most dear to him, or else, that all was to his discredit, as not really fitting either for any king or for Alexander himself. Some say that for the greater part of that day he lay upon his friend's body and wept and would not be parted from it; he was forced away by his companions; others that all the day and all the night he lay on the body; others again that he hanged Critobulus the doctor and that for a draught wrongly administered; others again because Critobulus had seen Hephaestion drinking most immoderately and had not stopped him; but that Alexander shaved his hair in regard for the dead man, and the rest I regard as not unlikely, and done in emulation of Achilles with whom he had a rivalry from boyhood. Some add also that Alexander himself for a time drove the car in which the body was borne; and this statement I regard as quite credible; yet there is no fact that he bade the temple of Asclepius at Babylon be razed to the ground, a barbaric order, and not in Alexander's way at all; but rather suitable to Xerxes, whose ire towards things divine and harmonizing with those fetters which they say Xerxes let down into the Hellespont with the notion of punishing the Hellespont. But this also I think has been recorded not wholly outside the bounds of likelihood: that when Alexander was going to Babylon there met him in the way seers even as far as from Greece, and that among these were several Telmessian prophets, these received from Alexander what they asked for, and Alexander gave them a statue to take back to Asclepius with the words: 'Yet Asclepius has not been kind to me for he did not save for me the comrade whom I valued more than my life.' Then most authorities have recorded that he ordered sacrifice always to be offered to Hephaestion as a hero, others add that he sent to Ammon to enquire of the god if he permitted sacrifice to be made to Hephaestion as a god, but he refused.

The following, however, harmonizes in all accounts, that for three days after Hephaestion's death Alexander neither tasted food nor took any care of his health, but lay either moaning or in a sorrowful silence; and that he ordered a pyre to be made ready for him in Babylon at a cost of ten thousand talents, some say even more; and that he commanded mourning to be made over all the East, and that many of Alexander's Companions in respect for him dedicated themselves and their arms to the departed Hephaestion; and that Eumenes was the first to initiate this idea, of whom a little above[1] we said he had quarrelled with Hephaestion, and that he did this so that Alexander might not think him pleased at Hephaestion's death. At any rate Alexander never appointed anyone in place of Hephaestion as general of the Companions' cavalry, so that the name Hephaestion might never perish from his brigade; but it was still called Hephaestion's brigade, and the image went before it which had been modelled on Hephaestion. Then Alexander proposed an athletic and literary contest with a great number of competitors, and far more splendid than any before in regard to the money lavished upon it, for he provided three thousand competitors in all, and these not long afterwards competed at Alexander's own funeral.

XV Now the mourning had gone on some time, and Alexander was already recovering from it, and the Companions were able to assist him more. He now, therefore, made an expedition to the Cossaeans, a warlike race bordering on the Uxians. These Cossaeans are mountaineers, and dwell in village strongholds, and whenever a force drew near their mountain fastnesses, they would move off in mass or as convenient to each section, and so slip away, causing those who tried to attack them by force to be at fault. Then when the enemy was gone they turned again to their brigandage and found in it their livelihood. Alexander, however, drove out their tribe, even though he made his raid on them by winter. But winter and rough places never hindered him, nor yet Ptolemaeus son of Lagus, who led a portion of the army against them. In fact Alexander found nothing impossible of the warlike enterprises he undertook.

But as he was returning to Babylon embassies from the Libyans met him, congratulating him and offering him a crown on his becoming king of Asia, from Italy also Bruttians and Lucanians and Tyrrhenians sent envoys for a like purpose. It is said that the Carthaginians also sent envoys, and that others came from Ethiopia and the European Scyths, Celts also and Iberians, to ask for friendly terms, then indeed for the first time did Greeks and Macedonians become acquainted with their names and appearances. Some, they say, even appealed to Alexander to arbitrate in their differences with each other, and then especially both in his own estimation and in that of his followers Alexander appeared to be lord of all the earth and sea. Aristus indeed and Asclepiades from among the historians of Alexander assert that even Romans sent envoys; and that Alexander when he met their envoys prognosticated something of their future power when he noticed their orderliness and diligence and freedom, and when he also had learnt something of their constitution. This I have recorded neither as true nor as untrue; except that no Roman ever made mention of this embassy sent to Alexander, nor even the historians of Alexander whom I most follow, Ptolemaeus son of Lagus and Aristobulus; nor was it suitable for the Roman republic, which was then entirely free, to send to a foreign king, especially so far from their own home, when no scare compelled them, nor with any expectation of help, and being as they were a people particularly given to dislike of kings and of the very name of kings.

XVI. After this Alexander sent Heracleides the son of Argaeus to Hyrcania with shipwrights, bidding him cut wood from the Hyrcanian forests and build warships, some decked, some open, in the Greek fashion. For he had conceived a desire to explore this Caspian Sea (also called Hyrcanian) as well, to see with what other sea it unites, whether with the Euxine Sea, or whether on the east side, towards India, the great sea circling round pours into the Hyrcanian Gulf, just as he discovered the Persian Sea, called by some the Red Sea, to be only a gulf of the ocean. For no one had yet discovered the springs of the Caspian Sea, though many tribes dwell round it and navigable rivers flow into it, from Bactria, for instance, the river Oxus, the greatest of the Asian rivers, save the Indian, finds its way into this sea, and also the Jaxartes flowing through Scythia. Then the usual account is that the Araxes flowing from Armenia runs into this sea. These are the greatest; but a good many others pouring into these themselves pass into this sea; some known by Alexander's expedition into those parts, and others on the far side of the gulf, as would be, and among the Nomad Scythians, a part entirely unknown.

Crossing the Tigris with his army, Alexander marched towards Babylon, and there met him Chaldaean seers, who drew him aside from the Companions and begged him to stop the advance towards Babylon, for, they said, they had an oracle from their god Belus that his approach to Babylon at that time would mean disaster. He, however, answered them with a verse of Euripides the dramatist—it runs thus:

"Prophets, who prophesy the best, are best."[1]

"But, O King," said the Chaldaeans, "look not towards the west, nor lead your army westward, but rather wheel your force and lead it eastward." But this, by reason of the difficulty of the road, he could not do, but fate led him the way on which he was doomed to die. And possibly it was better for him to die in the height of his fame and of the general regard of mankind before any ordinary disaster befell him. It was for a reason like this probably that Solon advised Croesus to regard the end of a long life, and not declare any man happy before that. For the death of Hephaestion had proved no small disaster to Alexander himself, which Alexander himself I believe would have preferred to anticipate rather than to experience it during his lifetime, just as I think Achilles would have preferred to die before Patroclus rather than to have been the avenger of his death.

XVII. Some suspicion was entertained by Alexander towards these Chaldaeans that it was not so much in the way of prophecy as for their private advantage that the prevention of his advance to Babylon at that time would tend, for the temple of Belus was in the midst of the city of Babylon, in size immense and made of baked brick with bitumen for mortar. This temple, like the other shrines of Babylon, Xerxes razed to the ground, when he returned back from Greece, but Alexander was minded to build it up again, some say on the original foundations, and that for this reason he bade the Babylonians remove the heaps of earth, others say that he wished to build it larger than the old one. But since after his departure those charged with the work had taken it up languidly, he proposed to complete the work with all his force. The god Bel had much glebe consecrated by the Assyrian kings, and much treasure too. From this the temple was originally repaired, and the sacrifices offered to the god. But at that time the Chaldaeans enjoyed the revenues of the god, there being no cause for expenditure of the surplus income. For all these reasons Alexander suspected that they did not desire him to enter Babylon, lest if the temple was completed in a short time they might lose the enjoyment of these moneys. Yet Aristobulus states that Alexander was quite ready to yield to them so far as to withdraw from entering the city, and that he camped the first day on the river Euphrates, but the next day marched along the river, keeping it on his right, anxious to pass by that part of the city which had a western aspect, so as to turn thence and march eastward; but he could not advance this way with his force because of the difficulty of the ground since if he entered from the west, and at this point turned eastward, the ground was all marshy and full of pools. And thus he disobeyed the god partly of intent on, and partly without.

XVIII Moreover, Aristobulus records a story as follows. Apollodorus of Amphipolis, one of Alexander's Companions, commander of the force which Alexander left behind with Mazaeus the satrap of Babylon, meeting Alexander on his return from India, and perceiving that he was punishing severely the satraps appointed over different provinces, wrote to Peithagoras his brother, one of those seers who prophesy from the flesh of victims, to prophesy also concerning his own welfare. Peithagoras then wrote in answer to him asking who it was that he chiefly feared that he wanted the help of prophecy; and he replied that it was the King himself and Hephaestion. Peithagoras then sacrificed first in the matter of Hephaestion; and as the lobe could not be seen on the liver of the victim, he reported this, and sealing his letter sent it to Apollodorus from Babylon to Echatana, assuring him that he had nothing to fear from Hephaestion, for in a short time he would be removed from his path. This letter Aristobulus says that Apollodorus received on the day before Hephaestion died. Then Peithagoras sacrificed again in the matter of Alexander, and for Alexander also the liver of the victim showed no lobe. Peithagoras then sent a similar letter to Apollodorus about Alexander also. Then Apollodorus did not keep his counsel, but told Alexander the news he had received, with the idea of showing a kindness to the King, by advising him to beware lest any danger should at this time come upon him. He states further that Alexander thanked Apollodorus and, when he reached Babylon, asked Peithagoras what particular warning caused him to write thus to his brother. He replied that he found the liver of the victim without a lobe. Then when Alexander enquired what this sign portended, Peithagoras replied "Something very serious." However, Alexander was far from being incensed against Peithagoras, but rather had a higher opinion of him for speaking the truth outright. This Aristobulus says he learned at first hand from Peithagoras, and adds that Peithagoras prophesied later in the matter of Perdiccas and Antigonus, the same portent appeared for both, and Perdiccas, having taken the field against Ptolemaeus, perished, and Antigonus in the battle against Seleucus and Lysimachus, which took place at Ipsus. And besides this, a story on these lines has been recorded of Calanus, the Indian wise man, that when he was going to the funeral pyre, to his death, he greeted all the Companions, but refused to approach Alexander to wish him farewell, but said that he would meet him at Babylon and greet him there. This story was ignored at the time, but later, when Alexander died at Babylon, it came to the recollection of the hearers that he had, in reality, some divine inspiration about Alexander.

XIX Then when Alexander had entered Babylon embassies came to meet him from the Greeks, but history does not record for what purposes each embassy came. I am inclined to think that most of them were to offer him wreaths and to congratulate him on all his victories, and especially those in India, and also to express their joy that he came back safe from India. These he received graciously, and is stated to have dismissed them after showing his regard for them in the customary way. But such statues or other works of art or any other votive offering which Xerxes removed from Greece to Babylon or to the Pasargadae or to Susa or anywhere else in Asia, these he gave to the ambassadors to take back; and thus it is said that the bronze statues of Harmodius and Aristogeiton were taken back to Athens, as also the seated figure of Celcean[1] Artemis.

Aristobulus says that Alexander found in Babylon the fleet; one part had sailed up the Euphrates from the Persian Sea, that part which was with Nearchus; but the rest had been brought up from Phoenicia, two Phoenician quinqueremes, three quadriremes and twelve triremes, and upwards of thirty thirty-oared galleys. These had been bisected and carried across from Phoenicia to the Euphrates to the city of Thapsacus, and there they were put together again and sailed down to Babylon. Aristobulus also says that another detachment was being built for him, by cutting down the cypresses in Babylonia; for this is the only tree which grows freely in the Assyrian country, which is bare of everything else necessary for shipbuilding. As crews for the ships and for the other naval services there came a number of purple-shell divers and other persons whose business was on the sea, from Phoenicia and the rest of the coast. It is also said that Alexander dug a harbour at Babylon large enough to be a roadstead for a thousand ships of war, and dockyards on the harbour. Miccalus of Clazomenae was despatched to Phoenicia and Syria with five hundred talents to induce by pay or to purchase men accustomed to seafaring. For Alexander had an idea of colonizing the coast along the Persian Gulf, and the islands that lie near: for he thought that it would be just as prosperous a country as Phoenicia. His naval preparations were chiefly directed at the greater part of the Arabs, on the ground that they alone of the tribes on this side had sent no envoys, nor had done anything complimentary, or by way of honouring Alexander. The actual fact, in my estimation, is that Alexander was always insatiate in winning possessions.

XX. There is a story current that Alexander heard that the tribes of Arabs reverenced only two gods, Uranus and Dionysus, Uranus because they behold him and he contains within him all the stars and especially the sun, from which the greatest and most obvious benefit, in all directions, comes to mankind; Dionysus, in view of his journey to India. Alexander therefore thought himself worthy to be regarded as a third god by the Arabs, since he had achieved even more famous deeds than Dionysus, at any rate if he should conquer Arabia and permit them, as he had the Indians, to be governed according to their own customs. Then the prosperity of the country incited him, since he heard that in their oases cassia grew, and from the trees came myrrh and frankincense, and from the bushes, cinnamon was cut; and that from their meadows spikenard grew self-sown. Then there was also the size of their territory, since the sea-coast of Arabia was reported to him to be not much less than that of India, and that there were several islands adjacent, and harbours all over the coast, enough to give anchorage for his fleet, and to permit cities to be built on them, and those cities likely to be rich.

He was also informed of two islands in the sea near the mouth of the Euphrates. The first was not far from its outlet, being about a hundred and twenty stades from the shore, and from the river mouth. this one is smaller, and covered all over with thick wood; there was in it also a shrine of Artemis, and the dwellers about the shrine themselves performed the daily services; it pastured wild goats and chamois, and these were reserved as sacred to Artemis, and no one was allowed to hunt them save any who desired to sacrifice to the goddess on this excuse only might anyone hunt, and for this purpose hunting was not forbidden. This island, according to Aristobulus, Alexander commanded to be called Icarus, after the island Icarus in the Aegean Sea, upon which Icarus, son of Daedalus, according to the legend, fell when the wax, with which his wings had been fastened, melted, because he did not, according to his father's behest, fly low near the ground, but from his own folly flew high and so allowed the sun to melt and loose the wax, and so he left his name to both island and sea, the one being called Icarus, the other, Icarian. The other island was reported to be distant from the mouth of the Euphrates about a day and night's sail for a ship running before the wind, it was called Tylus, and it was large, and

All this was told to Alexander partly by Archias, who was sent with a thirty oared ship to reconnoitre the coastal voyage towards Arabia and arrived at the island Tylos[1] but did not venture further, but Androsthenes was despatched with another thirty oar and sailed round part of the Arabian peninsula, but farthest of all those who were sent out Hieron of [illegible] the steersman advanced who also received a thirty oar from Alexander For his sailing orders were to coast round the whole Arabian peninsula, till he reached the Arabian Gulf on the Egyptian side near Heroöpolis yet he did not dare to advance further though he had sailed round the greater part of Arabia, but he turned about and reported to Alexander the size of the peninsula as vast and not far short of that of India, and that a projection ran far into the ocean And this Nearchus states, when sailing from India sighted before they altered course for the Persian Gulf stretching out not far away, and indeed were on the point of putting in there that at least was the advice of Onesicritus the helmsman But Nearchus states that he forbade this since he had completed his voyage round the Persian Gulf and had to report to Alexander on the purposes for which he had been despatched For he had not been sent to navigate the Ocean, but to reconnoitre the coast lying on the Ocean and the inhabitants of the coast, and its anchorages, and its water supplies, and the manners and customs of the inhabitants, and what part of the coast was good for growing produce, and what part was bad, and that this was the reason that Alexander's army came through safely, for they would never have come through safe by sailing among the desert parts of Arabia This too is the reason given for Hiero's return

XXI Meanwhile, as the triremes were being built, and the harbour at Babylon being dug, Alexander sailed from Babylon down the Euphrates towards the river known as Pallacopas. This is eight hundred stades away from Babylon, and this Pallacopas is a canal from the Euphrates, not a river which rises from its own springs. For the Euphrates river flows from the Armenian hills, and in the winter season runs within its banks, its volume of water not being very great; but when spring begins, and especially during the summer solstice, it grows considerable and overflows its banks on to the Assyrian land. For it is then that the snows on the Armenian mountains melt and increase its volume considerably, and since the stream is high and swollen, it overflows into the surrounding country, unless it were diverted along the Pallacopas and so turned on to the marshes and the lakes, which begin with this canal and continue up to the territory nearest to Arabia, and thence running mostly over marshland finally pour out into the sea by many obscure mouths. Then when the snow has melted about the setting of the Pleiads the Euphrates runs with diminished stream, and yet all the same lets its overflow run by means of the Pallacopas into the lakes. If, however, the bed of the Pallacopas was not in turn blocked, so that the stream headed off by the banks remains in its bed, it would have drained off the Euphrates into it, and then the Assyrian plain would never be watered from it. But the outlets of the Euphrates into the Pallacopas were blocked by the satrap of Babylon, with considerable labour, even though they can easily be opened, since the earth about there is muddy and the most part of it is soft clay such as lets through the river water and makes it none too easy to turn the river back. Yet even so for three months over ten thousand Assyrians were engaged on this task.

When this was reported to Alexander it incited him to try to assist the land of Assyria. So then at the point where the stream of Euphrates was turned into the Pallacopas, he determined to close the outlet securely, but when he had gone about thirty stades he found the earth appearing rather stony, suggesting that if it were quarried, and then united with the old canal along the Pallacopas, it would not permit the water to pass through because of the solidity of the soil, and yet its shutting off could easily be done at the right season. For these reasons he sailed to the Pallacopas and down, by it, to the lakes in the direction of Arabia. There he saw a good site and built a city there and fortified it, and settled there

XXII Then Alexander, as if he had proved false the Chaldaean soothsayers, since he had suffered nothing harmful in Babylon, as they had prophesied, but had marched out of Babylon again before anything had happened, sailed up the marsh lands boldly, with Babylon on his left hand; but here some of his flotilla lost its way in the narrows for want of a pilot, until Alexander himself sent them a pilot and brought them back into the stream. A tale is told as follows Most of the tombs of the kings of Assyria are built in the lakes and in the marsh lands And as Alexander was sailing along the marshes, for he—as is said—was steering the trireme, a strong breeze struck his sun-hat and the ribbon attached to it, and the hat being heavy fell into the stream, but the ribbon was carried off by the breeze and caught on a reed, the reed being one of them which grew near a tomb of the ancient kings. This itself seemed a presage of his destiny; one of the sailors, however, swam off to fetch the ribbon, and removing it from the reed could not carry it in his hands, since it would have become wet as he swam; but he bound it round his head and so brought it across. Most of the historians say that Alexander gave him a reward of a talent for his smartness, but bade them behead him, since the prophets so bade him not to leave alive that head which had worn the royal ribbon. Aristobulus, however, states that he received the talent, but was flogged for fastening the ribbon about his head. Aristobulus also says that it was one of the Phoenician sailors who brought back to Alexander his ribbon, some say it was Seleucus and that this portended the death of Alexander and his great empire for Seleucus. For at any rate Seleucus was the greatest king of those who succeeded Alexander, and of the most royal mind, and ruled over the greatest extent of territory, next to Alexander; all this I regard as irrefragable

XXIII Alexander then returned to Babylon and found Peucestas with an army of twenty thousand Persians arrived from Persia, he had brought also a number of Cossaeans and Tapurians, because it was reported that these tribes were most warlike of the tribes bordering on Persia. There joined him also Philoxenus with an army from Caria and Menander from Lydia bringing others, and Menides with the forces of cavalry which had been serving under him. Embassies also in the meantime came from Greece, and their envoys, themselves crowned, came forward and crowned Alexander with golden crowns, as if they had come on a sacred embassy to honour some god. And yet he was not far from his end.

Then he commended the Persians for their enthusiasm, in that they had in all things obeyed Peucestas, and Peucestas himself too for his orderly government of them; and he enrolled them into the Macedonian brigades, so that a Macedonian corporal of ten led each section of ten, and besides him a Macedonian on double pay and a "ten stater" man, called so from the pay, which is less than the men on double pay, but more than the rank and file not belonging to the Distinguished Service Order. Then besides these were twelve Persians and last of the section a Macedonian he also a "ten stater" man. In the section, therefore, there were four Macedonians, three of these on extra pay and the corporal in charge of the section, and twelve Persians, the Macedonians wearing their native equipment, and the Persians either archers or with javelins on leather thongs.

Meanwhile Alexander exercised the fleet constantly, and there were many rivalries between the triremes and such quadriremes as were on the river, and there were races between oarsmen and between helmsmen, and crowns for the victors.

There came also from Ammon the special envoys whom Alexander had sent to enquire how he ought to honour Hephaestion: they reported that Ammon said that it was lawful to sacrifice to him as to a hero. Alexander was pleased with this oracle, and from henceforward honoured Hephaestion as a hero. To Cleomenes, an evil man who had done many grievous wrongs in Egypt, he sent a letter, and with this letter in regard to the affection shown for Hephaestion even in death and the reconciliation of him, I do not find any fault, but I do, for many other reasons. For the letter bade him build a heroic shrine for Hephaestion in Alexandreia of Egypt both in the city itself and in the island Pharos where is the lantern tower in the island, the shrine was to be in size exceedingly large, and remarkable for its costliness; and that he was to take care that the island be called by the name of Hephaestion, and the name "Hephaestion" was to be inscribed on all tokens which merchants exchanged one with another. This I cannot blame, except that Alexander showed great enthusiasm in no great matter. But I do blame this; the letter ran: "If I find these temples set in good order in Egypt, and these shrines of Hephaestion, whatever wrong you have hitherto done, I pardon it; and for the future, however great wrong you may do, you shall receive no harm at my hands." This command of a great king to a man who was set to rule a great country and a large population, and an evil man, too, I am very far from approving.

XXIV. But Alexander's own end was drawing near. Aristobulus says that something else threw a shadow before of the events to come. He was distributing the army which came with Peucestas from Persia and from the ocean with Philoxenus and Menander, into the Macedonian ranks, and feeling thirsty he went away from the tribunal, leaving the royal throne untenanted. On either side of the throne were couches with silver feet, on which the Companions in attendance on him used to sit. Some quite obscure person—some say a prisoner, but under open arrest—saw the throne vacant and the couches, and the chamberlains standing round about the throne—for the Companions had retired when the King did—passed through the rank of chamberlains, ascended and sat upon the throne. They did not indeed—owing to some Persian custom—drag him off the throne, but rending their garments began to beat themselves on their breasts and faces as if some terrible disaster had happened. When Alexander learnt this, he ordered the man who had sat on the throne to be tortured, desiring to know if perchance he had done this by some set arrangement, of the nature of some plot. He would only say that the idea had come to him to do so, and for this the seers all the more prophesied that what had happened meant some great harm.

Not many days afterwards Alexander had offered to the customary gods sacrifices in thanks for good fortune, as well as some in consequence of the seers' advice, and was feasting with his friends and drinking late into the night. It is said that he also gave victims to sacrifice to the army, and wine, by their sections and centuries. Some have recorded that he desired to leave the carouse and retire to his bedroom, but that Medius, one of his most trusted Companions at that time, met him and asked him to come and take wine with himself; for it would be a merry party.

XXV. And indeed the royal diaries have it this way, that he drank and made merry with Medius, and then having arisen and bathed, went to sleep, and afterwards dined with Medius, and again drank till late in the night, and then breaking off from the carouse bathed, and after bathing ate a little and slept just where he was, the fever being already upon him. However, he was carried forth on a litter each day to his religious duties and sacrificed after his usual custom, after performing these sacrifices he lay down in the men's apartments till dark. Meanwhile he instructed the officers as to the march and the voyage, the one to prepare to march three days later, and the others, who would sail with him, to sail on the fourth day from then. And thence he was carried on his mattress to the river, and embarking on a boat sailed across the river to the garden, and there again bathed and rested. Next day again he bathed and offered the usual sacrifices; then entering his room lay down, talking to Medius; and bade his officers meet him next morning early. Then he dined lightly; and being carried again to his room remained in high fever the whole night; next day he bathed, and after bathing, sacrificed. Then he explained to Nearchus and the other officers all about the voyage, and how it was to be conducted, three days thence. Next day he bathed again, and sacrificed the appointed sacrifices, and after sacrificing continued in constant fever. Yet even so he summoned the officers and bade them see that all was ready for the voyage; he bathed in the evening, and after bathing was now very ill. But next day he was carried again to the house near the bathing place, and sacrificed the appointed sacrifices, and ill though he was, yet summoned the chief of his officers and again instructed them about the voyage. Next day he just contrived to be carried out to the sacrifices, and offered them, and yet still continued instructing his officers about the voyage. Next day also, being now quite ill, he yet offered the usual sacrifices. He ordered, however, the generals to wait in the court, and the commanders of thousands and half thousands to wait before the doors, and now being altogether ill he was carried from the garden to the palace. When the officers came in he knew them, but no longer spoke, but remained speechless. All the night he was in high fever, and all day, and the next night and day also.

XXVI All this is written in the royal diaries; and then that his soldiers longed to see him, some, that they might see him still alive, and others since it was announced that he was already dead, but they suspected that his death was being concealed by the bodyguards—at least so I think; and many from grief and longing for their King pressed in to see Alexander. They say that he was already speechless as the army filed past, yet he greeted one and all, raising his head, though with difficulty, and signing to them with his eyes. And the royal diaries say that in the temple of Serapis an all-night vigil was kept by Peithon, Attalus, Demophon and Peucestas, with Cleomenes, Menidas, and Seleucus, enquiring of the god whether it would be better for Alexander to be brought into the temple of the god and after prayer to be healed by the god, but that an oracle was given from the god that he should not be brought into the temple, but that it would be better for him if he abode where he was. Thus the Companions announced; and Alexander shortly afterwards breathed his last,

this, after all, being the "better" thing Beyond this neither Ptolemaeus nor Aristobulus have recorded. Some, however, recorded that his Companions asked him to whom he left his kingdom, and he replied, "to the best", others relate that he added to this, that he saw that there would be a great funeral contest on his death

XXVII I am aware, of course, that there have been many other details recorded of Alexander's death, for instance, that Antipater sent him a drug, and that he died of this drug and that Aristotle made up this drug for Antipater, already fearing Alexander on account of Calisthenes' death and that Cassander, Antipater's son, brought it Others have even said that it was conveyed in a mule's hoof, and that Iollas, Cassander's younger brother, gave it to Alexander, for that Iollas was the royal cupbearer, and had some grievance against Alexander not long before his death, others again that Medius had some hand in the business, from an infatuation for Iollas, for it was Medius who suggested to Alexander the drinking-bout, and that Alexander had a sharp feeling of pain after quaffing the cup; and on feeling this he retired from the carouse. One writer has not even shrunk from the statement that Alexander, perceiving that he could not survive, went to throw himself into the Euphrates, so that he might disappear from the world and leave behind the tradition more credible to posterity that his birth was of the gods and that to the gods he passed, but Roxane his wife saw that he was going out, and when

XXVIII Alexander died in the hundred and fourteenth Olympiad, in the archonship at Athens of Hegesias He lived thirty-two years and eight months, as Aristobulus says, he reigned twelve years and the aforesaid eight months In body he was very handsome, a great lover of hardships, of much shrewdness, most courageous, most zealous for honour and danger, and most careful of religion, most temperate in bodily pleasure, but as for pleasures of the mind, insatiable of glory alone; most brilliant to seize on the right course of action, even where all was obscure; and where all was clear, most happy in his conjectures of likelihood, most masterly in marshalling an army, arming and equipping it, and in uplifting his soldiers' spirits and filling them with good hopes, and brushing away anything fearful in dangers by his own want of fear—in all this most noble And all that had to be done in uncertainty he did with the utmost daring, he was most skilled in swift anticipation and gripping of his enemy before anyone had time to fear the event, he was most reliable in keeping promises or agreement, most guarded in not being trapped by the fraudulent, very sparing of money for his own pleasure, but most generous in benefits of others.

XXIX If, however, Alexander committed any error through haste or in anger, or if he went some distance in the direction of Eastern arrogance, this I do not regard as important, if readers will consider in a spirit of charity Alexander's youth his unbroken success, and those courtiers who associate with kings to flatter but not to improve them, and who always will so associate with kings to their harm But I do know that to Alexander alone of the kings of old did repentance for his faults come, by reason of his noble nature, while most people, if they have admitted any error, by defending their misdeed, as if it were a good deed think that they will conceal their error, and this is a great mistake For I at least feel that the only cure for sin is a confession of sin and evidence of repentance, since the offended party will not feel the offences so grievous if the offender agrees that he did not well, and for the man himself this good hope is left behind for the future, that he will not so offend again if he appear grieved at the errors of the past But that he referred his birth to a god, even this I do not altogether think to be a grave fault, unless perhaps it was a mere device to impress his subjects, and to appear more dignified. In point of fact I hold him no less famous a king than Minos, Aeacus, or Radamanthus, they traced their origin back to Zeus, and yet this was not associated by men of old with any arrogance, nor yet Theseus descent from Poseidon, nor Ion's from Apollo. Moreover, I feel that the adoption of Persian equipage was a device, both towards the Persians, so that their King might not appear wholly removed from them, and towards the Macedonians to mark some reversion from Macedonian abruptness and arrogance; for the same reason, I suspect, he drafted into their ranks the Persian troops who carried the golden apples, and the Persian nobles into their cavalry squadrons. And his carousings, as Aristobulus says, were prolonged not for the wine, for Alexander was no wine-bibber, but from a spirit of comradeship.

XXX Whosoever speaks evil of Alexander, let him speak such evil not merely by producing what deserves evil-speaking, but gathering all that Alexander did into a single whole, let such a one consider first himself, his own personality, his own fortunes, and then on the other hand Alexander, what he became, and the height of human prosperity which he reached, having made himself a king beyond all contradiction, of both continents and having spread his fame over the widest possible span; let such a one, I say, consider of whom he speaks evil, himself being more puny and busied about puny things and not even bringing these to success. For I myself believe that there was at that time no race of mankind, no city, no language, no tribe, who had not heard the name of Alexander. And so not even I can suppose that a man quite beyond all other men was born without some divine influence. Moreover oracles are said to have prophesied Alexander's death, and visions coming to different persons, and dreams, dreamed by different persons; there was also the general regard of mankind tending to this same conclusion, and the memory of one more than human, and even now there are other oracles, after this great gap of time, which have been delivered to the Macedonian race, and all tending to the highest estimation of him. True it is that I myself have quarrelled with certain acts in my history of Alexander's deeds, but I am bold to admire Alexander himself, and those acts I blamed, both for the sake of my veracity, and also for the general benefit of mankind, and that is why I myself too took up this history, not without the help of God.

INDICA

I. All the territory that lies west of the river Indus up to the river Cophen is inhabited by Astacenians and Assacenians, Indian tribes. But they are not like the Indians dwelling within the river Indus, tall of stature, nor similar in brave in spirit nor as black as the greater part of the Indians. These long ago were subject to the Assyrians, then to the Medes, and so they became subject to the Persians, and they paid tribute to Cyrus son of Cambyses from their territory as Cyrus commanded. The Nysaeans are not an Indian race, but part of those who came with Dionysus to India, possibly even of those Greeks who became past service in the wars which Dionysus waged with Indians, possibly also mountaineers of the neighbouring tribes whom Dionysus settled there together with the Greeks, calling the country Nysaea from the mountain Nysa and the city itself Nysa. And the mountain near the city on whose [1]thigh is Nysa is built is called Meros[2] because of the incident at Dionysus' birth. As thus the poets sang about Dionysus, and I leave it to the narrators of Greek or Eastern history to recount them. Among the Assacenians is Massaca, a great city, where resides the chief authority of the Assacenian land; and another city Peucela, this also a great city, not far from the Indus. These places then are inhabited on this side of the Indus towards the west, as far as the river Cophen.

II. But the parts from the Indus eastward, these I shall call India, and its inhabitants Indians. The boundary of the land of India towards the north is Mount Taurus. It is not still called Taurus in this land; but Taurus begins from the sea over against Pamphylia and Lycia and Cilicia; and reaches as far as the Eastern Ocean, running right across Asia. But the mountain has different names in different places; in one, Parapamisus, in another Emodus; elsewhere it is called Imaon, and perhaps has all sorts of other names, but the Macedonians who fought with Alexander called it Caucasus, another Caucasus, that is, not the Scythian; so that the story ran that Alexander came even to the far side of the Caucasus. The western part of India is bounded by the river Indus right down to the ocean, where the river runs out by two mouths, not joined together as are the five mouths of the Ister, but like those of the Nile, by which the Egyptian delta is formed, thus also the Indian delta is formed by the river Indus, not less than the Egyptian; and thus in the Indian tongue is called Pattaa.[1] Towards the south this ocean bounds the land of India, and eastward the sea itself is the boundary The southern part near Pattala and the mouths of the Indus were surveyed by Alexander and Macedonians and many Greeks, as for the eastern part, Alexander did not traverse this beyond the river Hyphasis. A few historians have described the parts which are this side of the Ganges and where are the mouths of the Ganges and the city of Palimbothra, the greatest Indian city on the Ganges.

III I hope I may be allowed to regard Eratosthenes of Cyrene as worthy of special credit, since he was a student of Geography He states that beginning with Mount Taurus, where are the springs of the river Indus, along the Indus to the Ocean, and to the mouths of the Indus, the side of India is thirteen thousand stades in length. The opposite side to this one, that from the same mountain to the Eastern Ocean, he does not reckon as merely equal to the former side, since it has a promontory running well into the sea, the promontory stretching to about three thousand stades. So then he would make this side of India, to the eastward, a total length of sixteen thousand stades. This he gives, then, as the breadth of India. Its length, however, from west to east, up to the city of Palimbothra, he states that he gives as measured by reed-measurements, for there is a royal road, and this extends to ten thousand stades, beyond that, the information is not so certain Those, however, who have followed common talk say that including the promontory, which runs into the sea, India extends over about ten thousand stades, but farther north its length is about twenty thousand stades. But Ctesias of Cnidus affirms that the land of India is equal in size to the rest of Asia, which is absurd, and Onesicritus is absurd, who says that India is a third of the entire world. Nearchus, for his part, states that the journey through the actual plain of India is a four months' journey. Megasthenes would have the breadth of India that from east to west, which others call its length, and he says that it is of sixteen thousand stades, at its shortest stretch. From north to south, then, becomes for him its length, and it extends twenty two thousand three hundred stades, to its narrowest point. The Indian rivers are greater than any others in Asia, greatest are the Ganges and the Indus, whence the land gets its name, each of these is greater than the Nile of Egypt and the Scythian Ister, even were these put together; my own idea is that even the Acesines is greater than the Ister and the Nile, where the Acesines having taken in the Hydaspes, Hydraotes, and Hyphasis, runs into the Indus, so that its breadth there becomes thirty stades. Possibly also other greater rivers run through the land of India.

IV. As for the yonder side of the Hyphasis, I cannot speak with confidence, since Alexander did not proceed beyond the Hyphasis. But of these two greatest rivers, the Ganges and the Indus, Megasthenes wrote that the Ganges is much greater than the Indus, and so do all others who mention the Ganges, for they say the Ganges is already large as it comes from its springs, and receives as tributaries the river Cainas and the Erannoboas and the Cosoanus, all navigable, also the river Sonus and the Sittocatis and the Solomatis, these likewise navigable. Then besides there are the Condochates and the Sambus and Magon and Agoranis and Omalis, and also there run into it the Commenases, a great river, and the Cacuthis and Andomatis, flowing from the Indian tribe of the Mandiadinae, after them the Amystis by the city Catadupas, and the Oxymagis at the place called Pasalae, and the Errenvis among the Mathae, an Indian tribe, also meet the Ganges. Megasthenes says that of these none is inferior to the Maeander, where the Maeander is navigable. The breath therefore of the Ganges, where it is at its narrowest, runs to a hundred stades, often it spreads into lakes, so that the opposite side cannot be seen, where it is low and has no projections of hills. It is the same with the Indus, the Hydrastes, in the territory of the Cambatholians, receives the Hyphasis in that of the Astrybae, and the Saranges from the Cecians, and the Neydrus from the Attacenians, and flows, with these, into the Acesines. The Hydaspes also among the Oxydracae receives the Sinarus among the Arispae and it too flows out into the Acesines. The Acesines among the Malians joins the Indus, and the Tutapus, a large river, flows into the Acesines. All these rivers swell the Acesines, and proudly retaining its own name it flows into the Indus. The Cophen, in the Peucelaetis, taking with it the Malantus, the Soastus, and the Garroeas, joins the Indus. Above these the Parenus and Saparnus, not far from one another, flow into the Indus. The Soanus, from the mountains of the Abissareans, without any tributary, flows into it. Most of these Megasthenes reports to be navigable. It should not then be incredible that neither Nile nor Ister can be even compared with Indus or Ganges in volume of water. For we know of no tributary to the Nile, rather from it canals have been cut through the land of Egypt. As for the Ister, it emerges from its springs a meagre stream, but receives many tributaries; yet not equal in number to the Indian tributaries which flow into Indus or Ganges, and very few of these are navigable. I myself have only noticed the Enus and the Saus. The Enus on the line between Norica and Rhaetia joins the Ister, the Saus in Paeonia. The country where the rivers join is called Taurunus. If anybody is aware of other navigable rivers which form tributaries to the Ister, he certainly does not know many.

V I hope that anyone who desires to explain the cause of the number and size of the Indian rivers will do so; and that my remarks may be regarded as set down on hearsay only. For Megasthenes has recorded names of many other rivers, which beyond the Ganges and the Indus run into the eastern and southern outer ocean, so that he states the number of Indian rivers in all to be fifty-eight, and these all navigable. But not even Megasthenes, so far as I can see, travelled over any large part of India, yet a good deal more than the followers of Alexander son of Philip did. For he states that he met Sandracottus, the greatest of the Indian kings and Porus, even greater than he was. This Megasthenes says, moreover, that the Indians waged war on no men, nor other men on the Indians, but on the other hand that Sesostris the Egyptian, after subduing the most part of Asia, and after invading Europe with an army, yet returned back, and Indathyrsis the Scythian who started from Scythia subdued many tribes of Asia, and invaded Egypt victoriously, but Semiramis the Assyrian queen tried to invade India, but died before she could carry out her purposes, it was in fact Alexander only who actually invaded India. Before Alexander, too, there is a considerable tradition about Dionysus as having also invaded India, and having subdued the Indians; about Heracles there is not much tradition. As for Dionysus, the city of Nysa is no mean memorial of his expedition, and also Mount Meros and the growth of ivy on this mountain, then the habit of the Indians themselves setting out to battle with the sound of drums and cymbals, and their dappled costume, like that worn by the bacchanals of Dionysus. But of Heracles the memorials are slight. Yet the story of the rock Aornos,[1] which Alexander forced, namely, that Heracles could not capture it, I am inclined to think a Macedonian boast, just as the Macedonians called Paropamisus by the name of Caucasus, though it has nothing to do with Caucasus. And besides, learning that there was a cave among the Paropamisadae, they said that this was the cave of Prometheus the Titan, in which he was crucified for his theft of the fire. Among the Sibae, too, an Indian tribe, having noticed them clad with skins they used to assert that they were relics of Heracles' expedition. What is more, as the Sibae carried a club, and they brand their cattle with a club, they referred this too to some memory of Heracles' club. If anyone believes this, at least it must be some other Heracles, not he of Thebes, but either of Tyre or of Egypt, or some great king of the higher inhabited country near India.

VI. This then must be regarded as a digression, so that too much credence may not be given to the stories which certain persons have related about the Indians beyond the Hyphasis, for those who served under Alexander are reasonably trustworthy up to the Hyphasis. For Megasthenes tells us this also about an Indian river; its name is Silas, it flows from a spring of the same name as the river through the territory of the Sileans, the people also named both from river and spring. Its water has the following peculiarity, nothing is supported by it, nothing can swim in it or float upon it, but everything goes straight to the bottom, so far is this water thinner and more airy than any other. In the summer there is rain through India, especially on the mountains, Parapamisus and Hemodus and the Imaus, and from them the rivers run great and turbulent. The plains of India also receive rain in summer, and much part of them becomes swamp, in fact Alexander's army retired from the river Acesines in midsummer, when the river had overflowed on to the plains. From these, therefore, one can gauge the flooding of the Nile, since probably the mountains of Ethiopia receive rain in summer, and from them the Nile is swollen and overflows its banks on to the land of Egypt, the Nile therefore also runs turbid this time of the year, as it probably would not be from melting snow, nor yet if its stream was dammed up by the seasonal winds which blow during the summer, and besides, the mountains of Ethiopia are probably not snow-covered, on account of the heat. But that they receive rain as India does is not outside the bounds of probability, since in other respects India is not unlike Ethiopia, and the Indian rivers have crocodiles like the Ethiopian and Egyptian Nile, and some of the Indian rivers have fish and other large water animals like those of the Nile, save the river-horse, though Onesicritus states that they do have the river horse also. The appearance of the inhabitants, too, is not so far different in India and Ethiopia, the southern Indians resemble the Ethiopians a good deal, and are black of countenance, and their hair black also, only they are not as snub-nosed or so much haired as the Ethiopians; but the southern Indians are most like the Egyptians in appearance.

VII. Megasthenes states that there are one hundred and eighteen Indian tribes. That there are many, I agree with Megasthenes, but I cannot conjecture how he learnt and recorded the exact number, when he never visited any great part of India and since these different races have not much intercourse one with another. The Indians, he says, were originally nomads as are the non-agricultural Scythians who wandering in their waggons inhabit now one and now another part of Scythia, not dwelling in cities and not reverencing as temples of the gods, just so the Indians also had no cities and built no temples, but were clothed with the skins of animals slain in the chase and for food ate the bark of trees, these trees were called in the Indian tongue Tala[1] and there grew upon them just as on the tops of palm trees what look like clews of wool. They also used as food what game they had captured, eating it raw before at least Dionysus came into India. But when Dionysus had come, and become master of India, he founded cities and gave laws for these cities and became to the Indians the bestower of wine as to the Greeks and taught them to sow their land giving them seed. It may be that Triptolemus when he was sent out by Demeter to sow the entire earth did not come this way or perhaps before Triptolemus this Dionysus whoever he was

came to India and gave the Indians seeds of domesticated plants, then Dionysus first yoked oxen to the plough and made most of the Indians agriculturists instead of wanderers, and armed them also with the arms of warfare. Further, Dionysus taught them to reverence other gods, but especially, of course, himself, with clashings of cymbals and beating of drums and dancing in the Satyric fashion, the dance called among Greeks the "cordax", and taught them to wear long hair in honour of the god, and instructed them in the wearing of the conical cap and the anointings with perfumes, so that the Indians came out even against Alexander to battle with the sound of cymbals and drums.

VIII When departing from India, after making all these arrangements, he made Spatembas king of the land, one of his Companions, being most expert in Bacchic rites, when Spatembas died, Budyas his son reigned in his stead, the father was King of India fifty-two years, and the son twenty years, and his son, again, came to the throne, one Cradeuas, and his descendants for the most part received the kingdom in succession, son succeeding father, if the succession failed, then the kings were appointed for some pre-eminence. But Heracles, whom tradition states to have arrived as far as India, was called by the Indians themselves "Indigenous." This Heracles was chiefly honoured by the Surasenians, an Indian tribe, among whom are two great cities, Methora and Cleisobora, and the navigable river

Iobares flows through their territory Megasthenes also says that the garb which this Heracles wore was like that of the Theban Heracles, as also the Indians themselves record, he also had many sons in his country, for this Heracles too wedded many wives; he had only one daughter, called Pandaea, as also the country in which she was born, and to rule which Heracles educated her, was called Pandaea after the girl; here she possessed five hundred elephants given by her father, four thousand horsemen, and as many as a hundred and thirty thousand foot-soldiers. This also some writers relate about Heracles; he traversed all the earth and sea, and when he had rid the earth of evil monsters he found in the sea a jewel much affected by women. And thus, even to our day, those who bring exports from India to our country purchase these jewels at great price and export them, and all Greeks in old time, and Romans now who are rich and prosperous, are more eager to buy the sea pearl, as it is called in the Indian tongue; for that Heracles, the jewel appearing to him charming, collected from all the sea to India this kind of pearl, to adorn his daughter. And Megasthenes says that this oyster is taken with nets, that it is a native of the sea, many oysters being together, like bees; and that the pearl oysters have a king or queen, as bees do. Should anyone by chance capture the king, he can easily surround the rest of the oysters, but should the king slip through, then the others cannot be taken; and of those that are taken, the Indians let their flesh rot, but use the skeleton as an ornament. For among the Indians this pearl sometimes is worth three times its weight in solid gold, which is itself dug up in India.

IX. In this country where Heracles' daughter was queen, the girls are marriageable at seven years, and the men do not live longer than forty years. About this there is a story among the Indians, that Heracles, to whom when in mature years this daughter was born, realizing that his own end was near, and knowing of no worthy husband to whom he might bestow his daughter, himself became her husband when she was seven, so that Indian kings, their children, were left behind. Heracles made her then marriageable, and hence all the royal race of Pandaea arose, with the same privilege from Heracles. But I think, even if Heracles was able to accomplish anything so absurd, he could have lengthened his own life, so as to mate with the girl when of maturer years. But really if this about the age of the girls in this district is true, it seems to me to tend the same way as the men's age, since the oldest of them die at forty years. For when old age comes on so much sooner and death with age, maturity will reasonably be earlier, in proportion to the end, so that at thirty the men might be on the threshold of old age, and at twenty, men in their prime, and manhood at about fifteen, so that the women might reasonably be marriageable at seven. For that the fruits ripen earlier in this country than elsewhere, and perish earlier, this Megasthenes himself tells us. From Dionysus to Sandracottus the Indians counted a hundred and fifty-three kings, over six thousand and forty-two years, and during this time thrice [movements were made] for liberty , this for three hundred years, the other for a hundred and twenty years; the Indians say that Dionysus was fifteen generations earlier than Heracles, but no one else ever invaded India, not even Cyrus son of Cambyses, though he made an expedition against the Scythians, and in all other ways was the most energetic of the kings in Asia, but Alexander came and conquered by force of arms all the countries he entered; and would have conquered the whole world had his army been wi ling But no Indian ever went outside his own country on a warlike expedition, so righteous were they.

X. This also is related; that Indians do not put up memorials to the dead, but they regard their virtues as sufficient memorials for the departed, and the songs which they sing at their funerals. As for the cities of India, one could not record their number accurately by reason of their multitude, but those of them which are near rivers or near the sea, they build of wood; for if they were built of brick, they could not last long because of the rain, and also because their rivers overflow their banks and fill the plains with water. But such cities as are built on high and lofty places, they make of brick and clay. The greatest of the Indian cities is called Palimbothra, in the district of the Prasians, at the confluence of the Erannoboas and the Ganges; the Ganges, greatest of all rivers; the Erannoboas may be the third of the Indian rivers, itself greater than the rivers of other countries; but it yields precedence to the Ganges, when it pours into it its tributary stream. And Megasthenes says that the length of the city along either side, where it is longest, reaches to eighty stades; its breadth to fifteen; and a ditch has been dug round the city, six plethra in breadth, thirty cubits high, and on the wall are five hundred and seventy towers, and sixty-four gates. This also is remarkable in India, that all Indians are free, and no Indian at all is a slave. In this the Indians agree with the Lacedaemonians. Yet the Lacedaemonians have Helots for slaves, who perform the duties of slaves; but the Indians have no slaves at all, much less is any Indian a slave.

XI. The Indians generally are divided into seven castes. Those called the wise men are less in number than the rest, but chiefest in honour and regard For they are under no necessity to do any bodily labour, nor to contribute from the results of their work to the common store, in fact, no sort of constraint whatever rests upon these wise men, save to offer the sacrifices to the gods on behalf of the people of India Then whenever anyone sacrifices privately, one of these wise men acts as instructor of the sacrifice since otherwise the sacrifice would not have proved acceptable to the gods These Indians also are alone expert in prophecy, and none, save one of the wise men is allowed to prophesy And they prophesy about the seasons of the year, or of any impending public calamity, but they do not trouble to prophesy on private matters to individuals, either because their prophecy does not condescend to smaller things, or because it is undignified for them to trouble about such things And when one has thrice made an error in his prophecy, he does not suffer any harm, except that he must for ever hold his peace, and no one will ever persuade such a one to prophesy on whom this silence has been enjoined. These wise men spend their time naked during the winter in the open air and sunshine but in summer, when the sun is strong, in the meadows and the marsh lands under great trees,[1] their shade Nearchus computes to reach five plethra all round, and ten thousand men could take shade under one tree, so great are these trees They eat fruits in their season, and the bark of the trees,[2] this is sweet and nutritious as much as are the dates of the palm Then next to these come the farmers, these being the most numerous class of Indians, they have no use for warlike arms or warlike deeds, but they till the land; and they pay the taxes to the kings and to the cities, such as are self-governing; and if there is internal war among the Indians, they may not touch these workers, and not even devastate the land itself; but some are making war and slaying all comers, and others close by are peacefully ploughing or gathering the fruits or shaking down apples or harvesting. The third class of Indians are the herdsmen, pasturers of sheep and cattle, and these dwell neither by cities nor in the villages. They are nomads and get their living on the hillsides, and they pay taxes from their animals; they hunt also birds and wild game in the country.

XII. The fourth class is of artisans and shopkeepers; these are workers, and pay tribute from their works, save such as make weapons of war; these are paid by the community. In this class are the shipwrights and sailors, who navigate the rivers. The fifth class of Indians is the soldiers' class, next after the farmers in number; these have the greatest freedom and the most spirit. They practise military pursuits only. Their weapons others forge for them, and again others provide horses; others too serve in the camps, those who groom their horses and polish their weapons, guide the elephants, and keep in order and drive the chariots. They themselves, when there is need of war, go to war, but in time of peace they make merry; and they receive so much pay from the community that they can easily from their pay support others. The sixth class of Indians are those called overlookers. They oversee everything that goes on in the country or in the cities, and this they report to the King, where the Indians are governed by kings, or to the authorities, where they are independent. To these it is illegal to make any false report, nor was any Indian ever accused of such falsification. The seventh class is those who deliberate about the community together with the King, or, in such cities as are self-governing, with the authorities. In number this class is small, but in wisdom and uprightness it bears the palm from all others, from this class are selected their governors, district governors, and deputies, custodians of the treasures, officers of army and navy, financial officers, and overseers of agricultural works. To marry out of any class is unlawful as, for instance, into the farmer class from the artisans, or the other way, nor must the same man practise two pursuits, nor change from one class into another, as to turn farmer from shepherd, or shepherd from artisan. It is only permitted to join the wise men out of any class, for their business is not an easy one, but of all most laborious.

the Indians hunt also, but these have a way of hunting elephants unlike all other kinds of hunting, just as these animals are unlike other animals. It is this; they choose a place that is level and open to the sun's heat, and dig a ditch in a circle, wide enough for a great army to camp within it. They dig the ditch five fathoms broad, and four deep. The earth which they throw out of the ditch they heap on either side of the ditch, and so use it as a wall; then they make shelters for themselves, dug out of the wall on the outside of the ditch, and leave small windows in them, through these the light comes in, and also they watch the animals coming in and charging into the enclosure. Then within the enclosure they leave some three or four of the females, those that are tamest, and leave only one entrance by the ditch, making a bridge over it, and here they heap much earth and grass so that the animals cannot distinguish the bridge, and so suspect any guile. The hunters then keep themselves out of the way, hiding under the shelters dug in the ditch. Now the wild elephants do not approach inhabited places by daylight, but at night they wander all about and feed in herds, following the largest and finest of their number, as cows do the bulls. And when they approach the ditch and hear the trumpeting of the females and perceive them by their scent, they rush to the walled enclosure; and when, working round the outside edge of the ditch, they find the bridge, they push across it into the enclosure. Then the hunters, perceiving the entry of the wild elephants, some smartly remove the bridge, others hurrying to the neighbouring villages report that the elephants are caught in the enclosure, and the inhabitants on hearing the news mount the most spirited, and at the same time most disciplined elephants, and then drive them towards the enclosure, and when they have driven them thither they do not at once join battle, but allow the wild elephants to grow distressed by hunger and to be tamed by thirst. But when they think they are sufficiently distressed, then they erect the bridge again, and enter the enclosure, and at first there is a fierce battle between the tamed elephants and the captives and then, as one would expect, the wild elephants are tamed, distressed as they are by a sinking of their spirits and by hunger. Then the riders dismounting from the tamed elephants tie together the feet of the now languid wild ones, then they order the tamed elephants to punish the rest by repeated blows, till in their distress they fall to earth, then they come near them and throw nooses round their necks, and climb on them as they lie there. And that they may not toss their drivers nor do them any injury, they make an incision in their necks with a sharp knife, all round, and bind their noose round the wound, so that by reason of the sore they keep their heads and necks still. For were they to turn round to do mischief, the wound beneath the rope chafes them. And so they keep quiet, and perceiving that they are conquered, they are led off by the tamed elephants by the rope.

XIV. Such elephants as are not yet full grown or from some defect are not worth the acquiring, they allow to depart to their own lairs. Then they lead off their captives to the villages and first of all give them green shoots and grass to eat, but they, from want of heart, are not willing to eat anything, so the Indians range themselves about them and with songs and drums and cymbals, beating and singing, lull them to sleep. For if there is an intelligent animal, it is the elephant. Some of them have been known, when their drivers have perished in battle, to have caught them up and carried them to burial; others have stood over them and protected them. Others, when they have fallen, have actively fought for them; one, indeed, who in a passion slew his driver, died from remorse and grief. I myself have seen an elephant clanging the cymbals, and others dancing; two cymbals were fastened to the player's forelegs, and one on his trunk, and he rhythmically beat with his trunk the cymbal on either leg in turn; the dancers danced in circle, and raising and bending their forelegs in turn moved also rhythmically, as the player with the cymbals marked the time for them. The elephants mate in spring, as do oxen and horses, when certain pores about the temples of the females open and exhale, the female bears its offspring sixteen months at the least, eighteen at most, it has one foal, as does a mare, and this it suckles till its eighth year. The longest-lived elephants survive to two hundred years, but many die before that by disease; but as far as mere age goes, they reach this age. If their eyes are affected, cow's milk injected cures them; for their other sicknesses a draught of dark wine, and for their wounds swine's flesh roast, and laid on the spot, are good These are the Indian remedies for them.

XV. The Indians regard the tiger as much stronger than the elephant. Nearchus writes that he had seen a tiger's skin, but no tiger, the Indians record that the tiger is in size as great as the largest horse, and its swiftness and strength without parallel, for a tiger, when it meets an elephant, leaps on to the head and easily throttles it. Those, however, which we see and call tigers are dappled jackals, but larger than ordinary jackals. Nay, about ants also Nearchus says that he himself saw no ant, of the sort which some writers have described as native of India; he saw, however, several of their skins brought into the Macedonian camp. Megasthenes, however, confirms the accounts given about these ants, that ants do dig up gold, not indeed for the gold but as they naturally burrow, that they may make holes, just as our small ants excavate a small amount of earth; but these, which are bigger than foxes, dig up earth also proportionate to their size; the earth is auriferous, and thus the Indians get their gold. Megasthenes, however, merely quotes hearsay, and as I have no certainty to write on the subject, I readily dismiss this subject of ants. But Nearchus describes, as something miraculous, parrots, as being found in India, and describes the parrot, and how it utters a human voice. But I having seen several, and knowing others acquainted with this bird, shall not dilate on them as anything remarkable, nor yet upon the size of the apes, nor the beauty of some Indian apes, and the method of capture. For I should only say what everyone knows, except perhaps that apes are anywhere beautiful. And further Nearchus says that snakes are hunted there, dappled and swift, and that which he states Peithon son of Antigenes to have caught,[1] was upwards of sixteen cubits; but the Indians (he proceeds) state that the largest snakes are much larger than this. No Greek physicians have discovered a remedy against Indian snake-bite; but the Indians themselves used to cure those who were struck. And Nearchus adds that Alexander had gathered about him Indians very skilled in physic, and orders were sent round the camp that anyone bitten by a snake was to report at the royal pavilion. But these same men cured other diseases and illnesses also. But there are not many illnesses in India, since the seasons are more temperate than with us. If anyone is seriously ill, they would inform their wise men, and they were thought to use the divine help to cure what could be cured.

[1] Query Antigenes, but possibly under some textual corruption or gloss there lurks a cobra or python. A (Vindobonensis) has Πύθωνα.

XVI. The Indians wear linen garments, as Nearchus says, the linen [1] coming from the trees of which I have already made mention. This linen is either brighter than the whiteness of other linen, or the people's own blackness makes it appear unusually bright. They have a linen tunic to the middle of the calf, and for outer garments, one thrown round about their shoulders, and one wound round their heads. They wear ivory ear-rings, that is, the rich Indians; the common people do not use them. Nearchus writes that they dye their beards various colours; some therefore have these as white-looking as possible, others dark, others crimson, others purple, others grass-green. The more dignified Indians use sunshades against the summer heat. They have slippers of white skin, and these too made neatly, and the soles of their sandals are of different colours, and also high, so that the wearers seem taller. Indian war equipment differs; the infantry have a bow, of the height of the owner, this they poise on the ground, and set their left foot against it, and shoot thus, drawing the bowstring a very long way back; for their arrows are little short of three cubits, and nothing can stand against an arrow shot by an Indian archer, neither shield nor breastplate nor any strong armour. In their left hands they carry small shields of untanned hide, narrower than their bearers, but not much shorter. Some have javelins in place of bows. All carry a broad scimitar, its length not under three cubits, and this, when they have a hand-to-hand fight—and Indians do not readily fight so among themselves—they bring down with both hands in smiting, so that the stroke may be an effective one. Their horsemen have two javelins, like lances, and a small shield smaller than the infantry's. The horses have no saddles, nor do they use Greek bits nor any like the Celtic bits, but round the end of the horses' mouths they have an untanned stitched rein fitted; in this they have fitted, on the inner side, bronze or iron spikes, but rather blunted; the rich people have ivory spikes; within the mouth of the horses is a bit, like a spit, to either end of which the reins are attached. Then when they tighten the reins this bit masters the horse, and the spikes, being attached thereto, prick the horse and compel it to obey the rein.

XVII The Indians in shape are thin and tall and much lighter in movement than the rest of mankind. They usually ride on camels, horses, and asses, the richer men on elephants. For the elephant in India is a royal mount, then next in dignity is a four-horse chariot, and camels come third, to ride on a single horse is low. Their women, such as are of great modesty, can be seduced by no other gift, but yield themselves to anyone who gives an elephant; and the Indians think it no disgrace to yield thus on the gift of an elephant, but rather it seems honourable for a woman that her beauty should be valued at an elephant. They marry neither giving anything nor receiving anything; such girls as are marriageable their fathers bring out and allow anyone who proves victorious in wrestling or boxing or running or shows pre-eminence in any other manly pursuit to choose among them. The Indians eat meal and till the ground, except the mountaineers, but these eat the flesh of game This must be enough for a description of the Indians, being the most notable things which Nearchus and Megasthenes, men of credit, have recorded about them. But as the main subject of this my history was not to write an account of the Indian customs but the way in which Alexander's navy reached Persia from India, this must all be accounted a digression.

XVIII For Alexander, when his fleet was made ready on the banks of the Hydaspes, collected together all the Phoenicians and all the Cyprians and Egyptians who had followed the northern expedition.

From these he manned his ships, picking out as crews and rowers for them any who were skilled in seafaring. There were also a good many islanders in the army, who understood these things, and Ionians and Hellespontines. As commanders of triremes were appointed, from the Macedonians, Hephaestion son of Amyntor, and Leonnatus son of Eunous, Lysimachus son of Agathocles, and Asclepiodorus son of Timander, and Archon son of Cleinias, and Demoneus son of Athenaeus, Archias son of Anaxidotus, Ophellas son of Seilenus, Timanthes son of Pantiades, all these were of Pella. From Amphipolis these were appointed officers Nearchus son of Androtimus, who wrote the account of the voyage, and Laomedon son of Larichus, and Androsthenes son of Callistratus, and from Orestis, Craterus son of Alexander, and Perdiccas son of Orontes Of Eordaea, Ptolemaeus son of Lagos and Aristonous son of Peisaeus, from Pydna, Metron son of Epicharmus and Nearchides son of Simus. Then besides, Attalus son of Andromenes, of Stympha, Peucestas son of Alexander, from Mieza, Peithon son of Crateuas, of Alcomenae; Leonnatus son of Antipater, of Aegae; Pantauchus son of Nicolaus, of Aloris, Mylleas son of Zoilus, of Beroea; all these being Macedonians. Alexander appointed also a Persian trierarch Bagus son of Pharnaces but of Alexander's own ship the helmsman was Onesicritus of Astypalaea, and the accountant of the whole fleet was Eudaemus son of Pucleon, of Corinth. As admiral was appointed Nearchus, son of Androtimus Cretan by race, and he lived in Amphipolis on the Strymon. And when Alexander had made all these dispositions he sacrificed to the gods, both the gods of his race and all of whom the prophets had warned him, and to Poseidon and Amphitrite and the Nereids, and to Ocean himself and to the river Hydaspes whence he started, and to the Acesines, into which the Hydaspes runs, and to the Indus into which both run, and he instituted contests of art and of athletics and victims for sacrifice were given to all the army, according to their detachments.

XIX. Then when he had made all ready for starting the voyage, Alexander ordered Craterus to march by the one side of the Hydaspes with his army, cavalry and infantry alike. Hephaestion had already started along the other, with another army even bigger than that under Craterus. Hephaestion took with him the elephants up to the number of two hundred. Alexander himself took with him all the peltasts, as they are called, and all the archers, and of the cavalry, those called 'Companions' in all, eight thousand. But Craterus and Hephaestion, with their forces, were ordered to march ahead and await the fleet. But he sent Philip, whom he had made satrap of this country, to the banks of the river

Acesines, Philip also with a considerable force, for by this time a hundred and twenty thousand men of fighting age were following him, together with those whom he himself had brought from the sea-coast; and with those also whom his officers, sent to recruit forces, had brought back; so that he now led all sorts of Oriental tribes, and armed in every sort of fashion. Then he himself loosing his ships sailed down the Hydaspes to the meeting-place of Acesines and Hydaspes. His whole fleet of ships was eighteen hundred, both ships of war and merchantmen, and horse transports besides and others bringing provisions together with the troops. And how his fleet descended the rivers, and the tribes he conquered on the descent, and how he endangered himself among the Mallians, and the wound he there received, then the way in which Peucestas and Leonnatus defended him as he lay there—all this I have related already in my other history, written in the Attic dialect. This my present work, however, is a story of the voyage, which Nearchus successfully undertook with his fleet starting from the mouths of the Indus by the Ocean to the Persian Gulf, which some call the Red Sea.

XX On this Nearchus writes thus: Alexander had a vehement desire to sail the sea which stretches from India to Persia, but he disliked the length of the voyage and feared lest, meeting with some country desert or without roadsteads, or not properly provided with the fruits of the earth, his whole fleet might be destroyed, and this, being no small blot on his great achievements, might wreck all his happiness; but yet his desire to do something unusual and strange won the day; still, he was in doubt whom he should choose, as equal to his designs, and also as the right man to encourage the personnel of the fleet, sent as they were on an expedition of this kind, so that they should not feel that they were being sent blindly to manifest dangers. And Nearchus says that Alexander discussed with him whom he should select to be admiral of this fleet; but as mention was made of one and another, and as Alexander rejected some, as not willing to risk themselves for his sake, others as chicken-hearted, others as consumed by desire for home, and finding some objection to each, then Nearchus himself spoke and pledged himself thus "O King, I undertake to lead your fleet! And may God help the emprise! I will bring your ships and men safe to Persis, if this sea is so much as navigable and the undertaking not above human powers." Alexander, however, replied that he would not allow one of his friends to run such risks and endure such distress; yet Nearchus did not slacken in his request, but besought Alexander earnestly, till at length Alexander accepted Nearchus' willing spirit, and appointed him admiral of the entire fleet, on which the part of the army which was detailed to sail on this voyage and the crews felt easier in mind, being sure that Alexander would never have exposed Nearchus to obvious danger unless they also were to come through safe. Then the spectacle of the whole preparation and the smart equipment of the ships and the outstanding enthusiasm of the commanders of the triremes about the different services and the crews had at first even those who a short while ago were hesitating both to bravery and to higher hopes about the whole affair; and besides it contributed not a little to the general good spirits of the force that Alexander himself had started down the Indus and had explored both outlets even into the Ocean and had offered victims to Poseidon, and also the other sea-gods and gave splendid gifts to the sea. Then trusting as they did in Alexander's generally remarkable good fortune they felt that there was nothing that he might not dare, and nothing that he could not carry through.

XXI. Now when the trade winds had sunk to rest, which continue blowing from the Ocean to the land all the summer season, and hence render the voyage impossible, they put to sea, in the archonship at Athens of Hegemachus, on the twentieth day of the month Boedromion, as the Athenians reckon it; but as the Macedonians and Asians counted it, it was the seventh year of Alexander's reign.[1] Nearchus also sacrificed before weighing anchor, to Zeus the Saviour, and he too held an athletic contest. Then moving out from their roadstead they anchored on the first day in the Indus river near a great rama, and remained there two days. The district was called Sura; it was about a hundred stades from the roadstead. Then on the third day they started forth and sailed to another canal thirty stades distance, and this canal was already salt for the sea came up into it, especially at full tides and then at the ebb the water remained there, mingled with the river water. This place was called Caumara. Thence they sailed twenty stades and anchored at Corestis, still on the river. Thence they started again and sailed not so very far for they saw a reef at the outlet of the river Indus and the waves were breaking violently on the shore and the shore itself was very rough. But where there was a softer part of the reef they dug a channel five stades long and brought the ships down it when the flood tide came up from the sea. Then sailing round to a distance of a hundred and fifty stades they anchored at a sandy island called Crocala and stayed there through the next day and there lives here an Indian race called Arabeans, of whom I made mention in my larger history and that they have their name from the river Arabis which runs through their country and finds its outlet in the sea forming the boundary between this country and that of the Oreitans. From Crocala keeping on the right hand the hill they called Ira they sailed on with a low-lying island on their left and the island running parallel with the shore makes a narrow bay. Then when they had sailed through this, they anchored in a harbour with good anchorage and as Nearchus considered the harbour a large and fine one he called it Alexander's Haven. At the heads of the harbour there lies an island about ten stades away, called Bibacta the neighbouring region, however, is called Sangada.

This island, forming a barrier to the sea, of itself makes a harbour. There constant strong winds were blowing off the ocean. Nearchus therefore, fearing lest some of the natives might collect to plunder the camp, surrounded the place with a stone wall. He stayed there thirty-three days; and through that time, he says, the soldiers hunted for mussels, oysters, and razor-fish, as they are called, they were all of unusual size, much larger than those of our seas. They also drank briny water.

XXII. On the wind falling, they weighed anchor, and after sailing sixty stades they moored off a sandy shore; there was a desert island near the shore. They used this, therefore, as a breakwater and moored there, the island was called Domai. On the shore there was no water, but after advancing some twenty stades inland they found good water. Next day they sailed up to nightfall to Saranga, some three hundred stades, and moored off the beach, and water was found about eight stades from the beach. Thence they sailed and moored at Sacala, a desert spot. Then making their way through two rocks, so close together that the oar-blades of the ships touched the rocks to port and starboard, they moored at Morontobara, after sailing some three hundred stades. The harbour is spacious, circular, deep, and calm, but its entrance is narrow. They called it, in the natives' language, "The Ladies' Pool," since a lady was the first sovereign of this district. When they had got safe through the rocks, they met great waves and the sea running strong; and moreover it seemed very hazardous to sail seaward of the cliffs. For the next day however, they sailed with an island on their port beam so as to break the sea so close indeed to the beach that one would have conjectured that it was a channel cut between the island and the coast. The entire passage was of some seventy stades. On the beach were many thick trees, and the island was wholly covered with shady forest. About dawn they sailed outside the island by a narrow and turbulent passage for the tide was still falling. And when they had sailed some hundred and twenty stades they anchored in the mouth of the river Arabis. There was a fine large harbour by its mouth but there was no drinking water, for the mouths of the Arabis were mixed with sea water. However, after penetrating forty stades inland they found a water hole, and after drawing water thence they returned back again. By the harbour was a high island desert and round it one could get oysters and all kinds of fish. Up to this the country of the Arabeans extends, they are the last Indians settled in this direction, from here on the territory of the Oreitans begins.

XXIII. Leaving the outlets of the Arabis they coasted along the territory of the Oreitans, and anchored at Pagala after a voyage of two hundred stades, near a breaking sea but they were able all the same to cast anchor. The crews rode out the seas in their vessels, though a few went in search of water, and procured it. Next day they sailed at dawn, and after making four hundred and thirty stades they put in towards evening at Cabana, and moored on a desert shore. There too was a heavy surf, and so they anchored their vessels well out to sea. It was on this part of the voyage that a heavy squall from seaward caught the fleet, and two warships were lost on the passage, and one galley; the men swam off and got to safety, as they were sailing quite near the land. But about midnight they weighed anchor and sailed as far as Cocala, which was about two hundred stades from the beach off which they had anchored. The ships kept the open sea and anchored, but Nearchus disembarked the crews and bivouacked on shore; after all these toils and dangers in the sea, they desired to rest awhile. The camp was entrenched, to keep off the natives. Here Leonnatus, who had been in charge of operations against the Oreitans, beat in a great battle the Oreitans, along with others who had joined their enterprise. He slew some six thousand of them, including all the higher officers, of the cavalry with Leonnatus fifteen fell, and of his infantry, among a few others, Apollophanes satrap of Gadrosia. This I have related in my other history, and also how Leonnatus was crowned by Alexander for this exploit with a golden coronet before the Macedonians. There provision of corn had been gathered ready, by Alexander's orders, to victual the host, and they took on board ten days' rations The ships which had suffered in the passage so far they repaired; and whatever troops Nearchus thought were inclined to malinger he handed over to Leonnatus, but he himself recruited his fleet from Leonnatus' soldiery.

XXIV. Thence they set sail and progressed with a favouring wind; and after a passage of five hundred stades they anchored by a torrent, which was called Tomerus. There was a lagoon at the mouths of the river, and the depressions near the bank were inhabited by natives in stifling cabins. These seeing the convoy sailing up were astounded, and lining along the shore stood ready to repel any who should attempt a landing They carried thick spears, about six cubits long; these had no iron tip, but the same result was obtained by hardening the point with fire. They were in number about six hundred. Nearchus observed these evidently standing firm and drawn up in order, and ordered the ships to hold back within range, so that their missiles might reach the shore; for the natives' spears, which looked stalwart, were good for close fighting, but had no terrors against a volley Then Nearchus took the lightest and lightest-armed troops, such as were also the best swimmers, and bade them swim off as soon as the word was given. Their orders were that, as soon as any swimmer found bottom, he should await his mate, and not attack the natives till they had their formation three deep, but then they were to raise their battle cry and charge at the double. On the word, those detailed for this service dived from the ships into the sea, and swam smartly, and took up their formation in orderly manner, and having made a phalanx, charged, raising, for their part, their battle cry to the God of War, and those on shipboard raised the cry along with them; and arrows and missiles from the engines were hurled against the natives. They, astounded at the flash of the armour, and the swiftness of the charge, and attacked by showers of arrows and missiles, half naked as they were, never stopped to resist but gave way. Some were killed in flight, others were captured, but some escaped into the hills. Those captured were hairy, not only their heads but the rest of their bodies, their nails were rather like beasts' claws, they used their nails (according to report) as if they were iron tools, with these they tore asunder their fishes, and even the less solid kinds of wood, everything else they cleft with sharp stones; for iron they did not possess. For clothing they wore skins of animals, some even the thick skins of the larger fishes.

XXV Here the crews beached their ships and repaired such as had suffered. On the sixth day from this they set sail, and after voyaging about three hundred stades they came to a country which was the last point in the territory of the Oreitans, the district was called Malana. Such Oreitans as live inland, away from the sea, dress as the Indians do, and equip themselves similarly for warfare; but their dialect and customs differ. The length of the coasting voyage along the territory of the Arabies was about a thousand stades from the point of departure; the length of the Oreitan coast sixteen hundred. As they sailed along the land of Indians—for thence onward the natives are no longer Indians—Nearchus states that their shadows were not cast in the same way; but where they were making for the high seas and steering a southerly course, their shadows appeared to fall southerly too; but whenever the sun was at midday, then everything seemed shadowless.[1] Then such of the stars as they had seen hitherto in the sky, some were completely hidden, others showed themselves low down towards the earth; those they had seen continually before were now observed both setting and then at once rising again. I think this tale of Nearchus is likely, since in Syene of Egypt, when the sun is at the summer solstice, people show a well where at midday one sees no shade; and in Meroe, at the same season, no shadows are cast. So it seems reasonable that in India too, since they are far southward, the same natural phenomena may occur, and especially in the Indian Ocean, just because it particularly runs southward. But here I must leave this subject.

XXVI. Next to the Oreitans, more inland, dwelt the Gadrosians, whose country Alexander and his army had much pains in traversing; indeed they suffered more than during all the rest of his expedition: all this I have related in my larger history. Below the Gadrosians, as you follow the actual coast, dwell the people called the Fish-eaters. The fleet sailed past their country. On the first day they unmoored about the second watch, and put in at Bagisara, a distance along the coast of about six hundred stades. There is a safe harbour there, and a village called Pasira, some sixty stades from the sea, the natives about it are called Pasireans. The next day they weighed anchor earlier than usual and sailed round a promontory which ran far seaward, and was high, and precipitous. Then they dug wells, and obtained a good deal of water, but of poor quality, and for that day they rode at anchor, because there was heavy surf on the beach. Next day they put in at Colta after a voyage of two hundred stades. Thence they departed at dawn, and after voyaging six hundred stades anchored at Calyba. A village is on the shore, a few date-palms grew near it, and there were dates, still green, upon them. About a hundred stades from the beach is an island called Carmine. There the villagers brought gifts to Nearchus, sheep and fishes, the mutton, he says, had a fishy taste, like the flesh of the sea-birds, since even the sheep feed on fish, for there is no grass in the place. However, on the next day they sailed two hundred stades and moored off a beach, and a village about thirty stades from the sea, it was called Cissa, and Carbis was the name of the strip of coast. There they found a few boats, the sort which poor fishermen might use, but the fishermen themselves they did not find, for they had run away as soon as they saw the ships anchoring. There was no corn there, and the army had spent most of its store, but they caught and embarked there some goats, and so sailed away. Rounding a tall cape running some hundred and fifty stades into the sea, they put in at a calm harbour, there was water there, and fishermen dwelt near; the harbour was called Mosarna.

XXVII. Nearchus tells us that from this point a pilot sailed with them, a Gadrosian called Hydraces. He had promised to take them as far as Carmania, from thence on the navigation was not difficult, but the districts were better known, up to the Persian Gulf. From Mosarna they sailed at night, seven hundred and fifty stades, to the beach of Balomus. Thence again to Barna, a village, four hundred stades, where there were many date-palms and a garden, and in the garden grew myrtles and abundant flowers, of which wreaths were woven by the natives. There for the first time they saw garden-trees, and men dwelling there not entirely like animals. Thence they coasted a further two hundred stades and reached Dendrobosa, and the ships kept the roadstead at anchor. Thence about midnight they sailed and came to a harbour Cophas, after a voyage of about four hundred stades. Here dwelt fishermen, with small and feeble boats; and they did not row with their oars on a rowlock, as the Greeks do, but as you do in a river, propelling the water on this side or that like labourers digging[1] the soil. At the harbour was abundant pure water. About the first watch they weighed anchor and arrived at Eiza, after a passage of eight hundred stades, where there was a desert beach and a heavy surf. Here, therefore, they anchored, and each ship took its own meal. Thence they voyaged five hundred stades and arrived at a small town built near the shore on a hill. Nearchus, who imagined that the district must be tilled, told Archias of Pella, son of Anaxidotus, who was sailing with Nearchus, and was a notable Macedonian, that they must surprise the town, since he had no hope that the natives would give the army provisions of their good will; while he could not capture the town by force, but this would require a siege and much delay, while they in the meanwhile were short of provisions. But that the land did produce corn he could gather from the straw which they saw lying deep near the beach. When they had come to this resolve, Nearchus bade the fleet in general to get ready as if to go to sea; and Archias in his place made all ready for the voyage; but Nearchus himself was left behind with a single ship and went off as if to have a look at the town.

XXVIII. As Nearchus approached the walls, the natives brought him in a friendly way gifts from the city; tunny fish baked in earthen pans, for these dwell the westernmost of the Fish-eating tribes, and were the first whom the Greeks had seen cooking their food; and they brought also a few cakes and dates from the palms. Nearchus said that he accepted these gratefully; and desired to visit the town, and they permitted him to enter. But as soon as he passed inside the gates, he bade two of the archers to occupy the postern, while he and two others, and the interpreter, mounted the wall on this side and signalled to Archias and his men as had been arranged: that Nearchus should signal, and Archias understand and do what had been ordered. On seeing the signal the Macedonians beached their ships with all speed, they leapt in haste into the sea, while the natives, astounded at this manœuvre, ran to their arms. The interpreter with Nearchus cried out that they should give corn to the army, if they wanted to save their city, and the natives replied that they had none, and at the same time attacked the wall. But the archers with Nearchus shooting from above easily held them up. When, however, the natives saw that their town was already occupied and almost on the way to be enslaved, they begged Nearchus to take what corn they had and retire, but not to destroy the town. Nearchus, however, bade Archias to seize the gates and the neighbouring wall, but he sent with the natives some soldiers to see whether they would without any trick reveal their corn. They showed freely their flour, ground down from the dried fish, but only a small quantity of corn and barley. In fact they used as flour what they got from the fish and leaves of corn flour they used as a delicacy. When however they had shown us they had the Greeks provisioned themselves from what was there, and put to sea, anchoring by a headland which the inhabitants regarded as sacred to the Sun: the head and was called Bageia.

XLIX. Thence weighing anchor about midnight, they voyaged another thousand stades to Talmena, a harbour giving good anchorage. Thence they went to Canasa a deserted town four hundred stades farther, here they found a well sunk and near by were growing wild date palms. They cut out the hearts[1] of these and ate them for the army had run short of food. In fact they were now really distressed by hunger, and seized on therefore by day and night, and anchored off a desolate shore. But Nearchus, afraid that they would disembark and leave their ships from faint heartedness, purposely kept the ships in the open roadstead. They sailed thence and anchored at Canate after a voyage of seven hundred and fifty stades. Here there are a beach and shallow channels. Thence they sailed eight hundred stades and anchoring at Troea there were small and poverty stricken villages on the coast. The inhabitants deserted their huts and the Greeks found there a small quantity of corn and dates from the palms. They slaughtered seven camels which had been left there, and ate the flesh of them. About daybreak they weighed anchor and sailed three hundred stades and anchored at Dagasira, where some wandering tribe dwelt. Sailing thence they sailed without stop all night and day, and after a voyage of eleven hundred stades they got past the country of the Fish-eaters, where they had been much distressed by want of food. They did not moor near shore, for there was a long line of surf, but at anchor, in the open. The length of the voyage along the coast of the Fish-eaters is a little above ten thousand stades. These Fish-eaters live on fish; and hence their name; only a few of them fish, for only a few have proper boats and have any skill in the art of catching fish, but for the most part it is the receding tide which provides their catch. Some have made nets also for this kind of fishing; most of them about two stades in length. They make the nets from the bark of the date-palm, twisting the bark like twine. And when the sea recedes and the earth is left, where the earth remains dry it has no fish, as a rule; but where there are hollows, some of the water remains, and in this a large number of fish, mostly small, but some large ones too. They throw their nets over these and so catch them. They eat them raw, just as they take them from the water, that is, the more tender kinds; the larger ones, which are tougher, they dry in the sun till they are quite sere and then pound them and make a flour and bread of them, others even make cakes of this flour. Even their flocks are fed on the fish, dried, for the country has no meadows and produces no grass. They collect also in many places crabs and oysters and shell-fish. There are natural salts in the country from these[1] they make oil. Those of them who inhabit the desert parts of their country live on fish as it is and with no cultivated parts find all their sustenance in the fish, but a few of them sow part of their district using the corn as a relish to the fish for the fish form their bread. The richest among them have built huts, they collect the bones of any large fish which the sea casts up, and use them in place of beams. Doors they make from any flat bones which they can pick up. But the greater part of them and the poorer sort, have huts made from the fishes' backbones.

XXX.[2] Large whales live in the outer ocean, and fishes much larger than those in our inland sea. Nearchus states that when they left Carmania about daybreak they saw water being blown upwards from the sea as it might be shot upwards by the force of a waterspout. They were astonished and asked the pilots of the convoy what it might be and how it was caused; they replied that these whales as they rose about the ocean spout up the water to a great height, the sailors, however, were so startled that the oars fell from their hands. Nearchus went and encouraged and cheered them and whenever he sailed past any vessel he signalled them to turn the ships' bow on towards the whales as if to give them battle, and raising their battle cry with the sound of the surge to row with rapid strokes and with a great deal of noise. So they all took heart of grace and sailed together according to signal. But when they actually were nearing the monsters, then they shouted with all the power of their throats, and the bugles blared, and the rowers made the utmost splashings with their oars. So the whales, now visible at the bows of the ships, were scared, and dived into the depths; then not long afterwards they came up astern and spouted the sea-water on high. Thereupon joyful applause welcomed this unexpected salvation, and much praise was showered on Nearchus for his courage and prudence. Some of these whales go ashore at different parts of the coast, and when the ebb comes, they are caught in the shallows, and some even were cast ashore high and dry, thus they would perish and decay, and their flesh rotting off them would leave the bones convenient to be used by the natives for their huts. Moreover, the bones in their ribs served for the larger beams for their dwellings, and the smaller for rafters, the jawbones were the doorposts, since many of these whales reached a length of five-and-twenty fathoms.

XXXI While they were coasting along the territory of the Fish eaters, they heard a rumour about an island,[1] which lies some little distance from the mainland in this direction, about a hundred stades, but is uninhabited. The natives said that it was sacred to the Sun and was called Nosala, and that no human being ever of his own will put in there; but that anyone who ignorantly touched there at once disappeared. Nearchus, however, says that one of his galleys with an Egyptian crew was lost with all hands not far from this island, and that the pilots stoutly averred about it that they had touched ignorantly on the island and so had disappeared. But Nearchus sent a thirty-oar to sail round the island, with orders not to put in, but that the crew should shout loudly, while coasting round as near as they dared, and should call on the lost helmsman by name, or any of the crew whose name they knew. As no one answered, he tells us that he himself sailed up to the island, and compelled his unwilling crew to put in, then he went ashore and exploded this island fairy-tale. They heard also another current story about this island, that one of the Nereids dwelt there, but the name of this Nereid was not told. She showed much friendliness to any sailor who approached the island; but then turned him into a fish and threw him into the sea. The Sun then became irritated with the Nereid, and bade her leave the island, and she agreed to remove thence, but begged that the spell on her be removed, the Sun consented, and such human beings as she had turned into fishes he pitied, and turned them again from fishes into human beings, and hence arose the people called Fish-eaters, and so they descended to Alexander's day. Nearchus shows that all this is mere legend, but I have no commendation for his pains and his scholarship; the stories are easy enough to demolish, and I regard it as tedious to relate these old tales and then prove them all false.

XXXII. Beyond these Fish-eaters the Gadrosians inhabit the interior, a poor and sandy territory, this was where Alexander's army and Alexander himself suffered so seriously, as I have already related in my other book. But when the fleet, leaving the Fish-eaters, put in at Carmania, they anchored in the open, at the point where they first touched Carmania; since there was a long and rough line of surf parallel with the coast. From there they sailed no further due west, but took a new course and steered with their bows pointing between north and west. Carmania is better wooded than the country of the Fish-eaters, and bears more fruits; it has more grass, and is well watered. They moored at an inhabited place called Badis, in Carmania, with many cultivated trees growing, except the olive tree, and good vines; it also produced corn. Thence they set out and voyaged eight hundred stades, and moored off a desert shore, and they sighted a long cape jutting out far into the ocean. It seemed as if the headland itself was a day's sail away. Those who had knowledge of the district said that this promontory belonged to Arabia, and was called Maceta, and that thence the Assyrians imported cinnamon and other spaces. From the beach off which the fleet anchored in the open mainland and the promontory, which they sighted opposite them running out into the sea, the last was in our opinion and Nearchus held the same, ran back into the interior, and would seem to be the Red Sea.¹ When they sighted this cape, Onesicritus bade them take their course from it and sail towards it, in order not to have the trouble of coasting round the bay. Nearchus, however, replied that Onesicritus was a fool, if he was ignorant of Alexander's purpose in despatching the expedition. It was not because he was unequal to the bringing of his force safely through on foot that he had despatched the fleet; but he desired to reconnoitre the coasts that lay on the line of the voyage, the roadsteads, the islets; to explore thoroughly any bay which appeared, and to learn of any cities which lay on the sea-coast, and to find out what land was fruitful and what was desert. They must therefore not spoil Alexander's undertaking, especially when they were almost at the close of their toils, and were, moreover, no longer in any difficulty about provisions on their coasting cruise. His own fear was, since the cape ran a long way southward, that they would find the land there waterless and sun-scorched. This view prevailed; and I think that Nearchus evidently saved the expeditionary force by this decision; for it is generally held that this cape and the country about it are entirely desert and quite denuded of water.

XXXIII. They sailed then, leaving this part of the shore, hugging the land; and after voyaging some seven hundred stades they anchored off another beach, called Neoptana. Then at dawn they moved off seaward, and after traversing a hundred stades they moored by the river Anamis, the district was called Hamnoreia. All here was friendly, and produced fruit of all sorts, except that olives did not grow there. There they disembarked, and had a welcome rest from their long toils, remembering the miseries they had endured by sea and on the coast of the Fish eaters, recounting one to another the desolate character of the country, the almost bestial nature of the inhabitants, and their own distresses. Some of them advanced some distance inland, breaking away from the main force, some in pursuit of this, and some of that. There a man appeared to them, wearing a Greek cloak and dressed otherwise in the Greek fashion, and speaking Greek also. Those who first sighted him said that they burst into tears, so strange did it seem after all these miseries to see a Greek, and to hear Greek spoken. They asked whence he came, who he was, and he said that he had become separated from Alexander's camp, and that the camp, and Alexander himself, were not very far distant. Shouting aloud and clapping their hands they brought this man to Nearchus; and he told Nearchus everything, and that the camp and the King himself were distant five days' journey from the coast. He also promised to show Nearchus the governor of this district and did so, and Nearchus took counsel with him how to march inland to meet the King. For the moment indeed he returned to the ship, but at dawn he had the ships drawn up on shore, to repair any which had been damaged on the voyage, and also because he had determined to leave the greater part of his force behind here. So he had a double stockade built round the ships' station, and a mud wall with a deep trench, beginning from the bank of the river and going on to the beach, where his ships had been dragged ashore.

XXXIV. While Nearchus was busied with these arrangements, the governor of the country, who had been told that Alexander felt the deepest concern about this expedition, took for granted that he would receive some great reward from Alexander if he should be the first to tell him of the safety of the expeditionary force, and that Nearchus would presently appear before the King. So then he hastened by the shortest route and told Alexander. "See, here is Nearchus coming from the ships." On this Alexander, though not believing what was told him, yet, as he naturally would be, was pleased by the news itself. But when day succeeded day, and Alexander, reckoning the time when he received the good news, could not any longer believe it, when, moreover, relay sent after relay, to escort Nearchus, either went a part of the route, and meeting no one, came back unsuccessful, or went on further, and missing Nearchus' party, did not themselves return at all, then Alexander bade the man be arrested for spreading a false tale and making things all the worse by this false happiness, and Alexander showed both by his looks and his mind that he was wounded with a very poignant grief. Meanwhile, however, some of those sent to search for Nearchus, who had horses to convey him, and chariots, did meet on the way Nearchus and Archias, and five or six others, that was the number of the party which came inland with him. On this meeting they recognised neither Nearchus nor Archias—so altered did they appear, with their hair long, unwashed, covered with brine, whitened, pale from sleeplessness and all their other distresses; when, however, they asked where Alexander might be, the search party gave reply as to the locality and passed on. Archias, however, had a happy thought, and said to Nearchus: "I suspect, Nearchus, that these persons who are traversing the same road as ours through this desert country have been sent for the express purpose of finding us; as for their failure to recognise us, I do not wonder at that, we are in such a sorry plight as to be unrecognizable. Let us tell them who we are, and ask them why they come hither." Nearchus approved; they did ask whither the party was going, and they replied: "To look for Nearchus and his naval force." Whereupon, "Here am I, Nearchus," said he, "and here is Archias. Do you lead on; we will make a full report to Alexander about the expeditionary force."

XXXV. The soldiers took them up in their cars and drove back again. Some of them, anxious to be beforehand with the good news, ran forward and told Alexander: "Here is Nearchus; and with him Archias and five besides, coming to your presence." They could not, however, answer any questions about the fleet. Alexander thereupon became possessed of the idea that these few had been miraculously saved, but that his whole army had perished; and did not so much rejoice at the safe arrival of Nearchus and Archias, as he was bitterly pained by the loss of all his force. Hardly had the soldiers told thus much, when Nearchus and Archias approached. Alexander could only with great difficulty recognise them, and seeing them as he did long-haired and ill-clad, his grief for the whole fleet and its personnel received even greater surety. Giving his right hand to Nearchus and leading him aside from the Companions and the bodyguard, for a long time he wept, but at length recovering himself he said: "That you come back safe to us, and Archias here, the entire disaster is tempered to me, but how perished the fleet and the force?" "Sir," he replied, "your ships and men are safe; we are come to tell with our own lips of their safety." On this Alexander wept the more, since the safety of the force had seemed too good to be true, and then he enquired where the ships were anchored. Nearchus replied: "They are all drawn up at the mouth of the river Anamis, and are undergoing a refit." Alexander then called to witness Zeus of the Greeks and the Libyan Ammon that in good truth he rejoiced more at this news than because he had conquered all Asia; since the grief he had felt at the supposed loss of the fleet cancelled all his other good fortune.

XXXVI. The governor of the province, however, whom Alexander had arrested for his false tidings, seeing Nearchus there on the spot, fell at his feet: "Here," he said, "am I, who reported your safe arrival to Alexander; you see in what plight I now am." So Nearchus begged Alexander to let him go, and he was let off. Alexander then sacrificed thank-offerings for the safety of his host, to Zeus the Saviour, Heracles, Apollo the Averter of Evil, Poseidon and all the gods of the sea, and he held a contest of art and of athletics, and also a procession; Nearchus was in the front row in the procession, and the troops showered on him ribbons and flowers. At the end of the procession Alexander said to Nearchus: "I will not let you, Nearchus, run risks or suffer distresses again like those of the past; some other admiral shall henceforth command the navy till he brings it into Susa." Nearchus, however, broke in and said: "King, I will obey you in all things, as is my bounden duty; but should you desire to do me a gracious favour, do not this thing, but let me be the admiral of your fleet right up to the end, till I bring your ships safe to Susa. Let it not be said that you entrusted me with the difficult and desperate work, but the easy task which leads to ready fame was taken away and put into another's hands." Alexander checked him speaking further and thanked him warmly to boot, and so he sent him back again, giving him a force as escort but a small one as he was going through friendly territory. Yet his journey to the sea was not untroubled: the natives of the country round about were in possession of the strong places of Carmania since their satrap had been put to death by Alexander's orders and his successor recently appointed, Tlepolemus, had not established his authority. Twice then or even thrice on the one day the party came into conflict with different bodies of natives who kept coming up and these without losing any time they only just managed to get safe to the sea-coast. There Nearchus sacrificed to Zeus the Saviour and held an athletic meeting.

XXXVII[1] When therefore Nearchus had thus duly performed all his religious duties they weighed anchor. Coasting along a rough and desert island, they anchored off another island a large one and inhabited; this was after a voyage of three hundred stades from their point of departure. The desert island was called Organa and that off which they moored Daracta. Vines grew on it and date palms and it produced corn; the length of the island was eight hundred stades. The governor of the island, Mazenes, carried with them as far as Susa as a token-guest. They said that in this island the tomb of the first chief of this territory was shown, his name was Erythrea, and hence came the name of the sea. Thence they weighed anchor and sailed onward, and when they had coasted about two hundred stades along this same island they anchored off it once more and sighted another island, about forty stades from this large one. It was said to be sacred to Poseidon, and not to be trod by foot of man. About dawn they put out to sea, and were met by so violent an ebb that three of the ships ran ashore and were held hard and fast on dry land, and the rest only just sailed through the surf and got safe into deep water The ships, however, which ran aground were floated off when next flood came, and arrived next day where the main fleet was. They moored at another island, about three hundred stades from the mainland, after a voyage of four hundred stades. Thence they sailed about dawn, and passed on their port side a desert island, its name was Pylora. Then they anchored at Saidona, a desolate little township, with nothing but water and fish, for the natives here were fish-eaters whether they would or not, because they dwelt in so desolate a territory. Thence they got water, and reached Cape Tarsias, which runs right out into the sea, after a voyage of three hundred stades. Thence they made for Cataea, a desert island, and low-lying, this was said to be sacred to Hermes and Aphrodite, the voyage was of three hundred stades. Every year the natives round about send sheep and goats as sacred to Hermes and Aphrodite, and one could see them, now quite wild from lapse of time and want of handling.

XXXVIII So far extends Carmania, beyond this is Persis. The length of the voyage along the Carmanian coast is three thousand seven hundred stades. The natives' way of life is like that of the Persians, to whom they are also neighbours, and they wear the same military equipment. The Greeks moved on thence, from the sacred island and were already coasting along Persian territory, they put in at a place called Ilas where a harbour is formed by a small desert island, which is called Cerandrus, the voyage thither is four hundred stades. At daybreak they sailed to another island, an inhabited one, and anchored there. Here, according to Nearchus, there is pearl fishing as in the Indian Ocean. They sailed along the point of this island a distance of forty stades and there moored. Next they anchored off a place called Oshus in a safe harbour; fishermen dwelt on its banks. Thence they sailed four hundred and fifty stades and anchored off Apostana; many boats were anchored there and there was a village near about sixty stades from the sea. They weighed anchor at night and sailed thence to a gulf with a good many villages settled round about. This was a voyage of four hundred stades, and they anchored below a mountain on which grew many date palms and other fruit trees such as flourish in Greece. Thence they manœuvred and sailed along to Cogana about six hundred stades, to an inhabited district, and they anchored off the torrent, called Areon, just at its outlet. The anchorage there was uncomfortable, the entrance was narrow, just at the mouth, since the ebb tide caused shallows in all the neighbourhood of the outlet. After this they anchored again at another river-mouth, after a voyage of about eight hundred stades. This river was called Sitacus. Even here, however, they did not find a pleasant anchorage, in fact this whole voyage along Persis was shallows, surf, and lagoons. There they found a great supply of corn brought together there by the King's orders, for their provisioning; there they abode twenty-one days in all, they drew up the ships, and repaired those that had suffered, and the others too they put in order.

XXXIX. Thence they started and reached the city of Hieratis, a populous place. The voyage was of seven hundred and fifty stades, and they anchored in a channel running from the river to the sea and called Heratemis. At sunrise they sailed along the coast to a torrent called Padagrus, the entire district forms a peninsula. There were many gardens, and all sorts of fruit trees were growing there, the name of the place was Mesambria. From Mesambria they sailed and after a voyage of about two hundred stades anchored at Taoce on the river Granis. Inland from here was a Persian royal residence, about two hundred stades from the mouth of the river. On this voyage, Nearchus says, a great whale was seen, stranded on the shore, and some of the sailors sailed past it and measured it, and said it was of ninety cubits' length. Its hide was scaly, and so thick that it was a cubit in depth, and it had many oysters, limpets, and seaweeds growing on it. Nearchus also says that they could see many dolphins round the whale, and these larger than the Mediterranean dolphins. Going on hence, they put in at the torrent Rogonis, in a good harbour; the length of this voyage was two hundred stades. Thence again they sailed four hundred stades and bivouacked on the side of a torrent; its name was Brisana. Then they found difficult anchorage, there were surf, and shallows, and reefs showing above the sea. But when the flood tide came in, they were able to anchor; when, however, the tide retired again, the ships were left high and dry. Then when the flood duly returned, they sailed out, and anchored in a river called Oroatis, greatest, according to Nearchus, of all the rivers which on this coast run into the Ocean.

XL. The Persians dwell up to this point and the Susians next to them. Above the Susians lives another independent tribe; these are called Uxians, and in my earlier history I have described them as brigands. The length of the voyage along the Persian coast was four thousand four hundred stades. The Persian land is divided, they say, into three climatic zones. The part which lies by the Red Sea is sandy and sterile, owing to the heat. Then the next zone, northward, has a temperate climate, the country is grassy and has lush meadows and many vines and all other fruits except the olive; it is rich with all sorts of gardens, has pure rivers running through, and also lakes, and is good both for all sorts of birds which frequent rivers and lakes, and for horses, and also pastures the other domestic animals, and is well wooded, and has plenty of game. The next zone, still going northward, is wintry and snowy. Nearchus tells us of some envoys from the Black Sea who after quite a short journey met Alexander traversing Persia and caused him no small astonishment, and they explained to Alexander how short the journey was. I have explained that the Uxians are neighbours to the Susians, as the Mardians—they also are brigands—live next the Persians, and the Cossaeans come next to the Medes. All these tribes Alexander reduced, coming upon them in winter-time, when they thought their country unapproachable. He also founded cities so that they should no longer be nomads but cultivators, and tillers of the ground, and so having a stake in the country might be deterred from raiding one another. From here the convoy passed along the Susian territory. About this part of the voyage Nearchus says he cannot speak with accurate detail, except about the roadsteads and the length of the voyage. This is because the country is for the most part marshy and runs out well into the sea, with breakers, and is very hard to get good anchorage in. So their voyage was mostly in the open sea. They sailed out, therefore, from the mouths of the river, where they had encamped, just on the Persian border, taking on board water for five days; for the pilots said that they would meet no fresh water.

XLI Then after traversing five hundred stades they anchored in the mouth of a lake, full of fish, called Catadertes at the mouth was a small island called Margastana. Thence about daybreak they sailed out and passed the shallows in columns of single ships, the shallows were marked on either side by poles driven down, just as in the strait between the island Leucas and Acarnania sign-posts have been set up for navigators so that the ships should not ground on the shallows. However, the shallows round Leucas are sandy and render it easy for those aground to get off, but here it is mud on both sides of the channel, both deep and tenacious, once aground there, they could not possibly get off. For the punt-poles sank into the mud and gave them no help, and it proved impossible for the crews to disembark and push the ships off, for they sank up to their breasts in the ooze. Thus then they sailed out with great difficulty and traversed six hundred stades, each crew abiding by its ship, and then they took thought for supper During the night however, they were fortunate in reaching deep sailing water and next day also, up to the evening, they sailed nine hundred stades, and anchored in the mouth of the Euphrates near a village of Babylonia, called Diridotis, here the merchants gather together frankincense from the neighbouring country and all other sweet-smelling spices which Arabia produces.

From the mouth of the Euphrates to Babylon Nearchus says it is a voyage of three thousand three hundred stades.

XLII There they heard that Alexander was departing towards Susa. They therefore sailed back, in order to sail up the Pasitigris and meet Alexander. So they sailed back, with the land of Susis on their left, and they went along the lake into which the Tigris runs. It flows from Armenia past the city of Nineus, which once was a great and rich city, and so makes the region between itself and the Euphrates, that is why it is called 'Between the Rivers.' The voyage from the lake up to the river itself is six hundred stades, and there is a village of Susis called Agimis, this village is five hundred stades from Susa. The length of the voyage along Susian territory to the mouth of the Pasitigris is two thousand stades. From there they sailed up the Pasitigris through inhabited and prosperous country. When they had sailed up about a hundred and fifty stades they moored there, waiting for the scouts whom Nearchus had sent to see where the King was. He himself sacrificed to the Saviour gods, and held an athletic meeting, and the whole naval force made merry. And when news was brought that Alexander was now approaching they sailed again up the river; and they moored near the pontoon bridge on which Alexander intended to take his army over to Susa. There the two forces met; Alexander offered sacrifices for his ships and men, come safe back again, and games were held; and wherever Nearchus appeared in the camp the troops pelted him with ribbons and flowers. There also Nearchus and Leonnatus were crowned by Alexander with a golden crown, Nearchus for the safe conveying of the ships, Leonnatus for the victory he had achieved among the Oreitans and the natives who dwelt next to them. Thus then Alexander received safe back his navy, which had started from the mouths of the Indus.

XLIII. On the right side of the Red Sea beyond Babylonia is the chief part of Arabia, and of this a part comes down to the sea of Phoenicia and Palestinian Syria; but on the west, up in the Mediterranean, the Egyptians are upon the Arabian borders. Along Egypt a gulf[1] running in from the Great Sea makes it clear that by reason of the gulf's joining with the High Seas one might sail round from Babylon into this gulf which runs into Egypt. Yet, in point of fact, no one has yet sailed round this way by reason of the heat and the desert nature of the coasts, only a few people who sailed over the open sea. But those of the army of Cambyses who came safe from Egypt to Siwa and those troops who were sent from Ptolemy Lagus to Seleucus Nicator at Babylon through Arabia crossed an isthmus in a period of eight days and passed through a waterless and desert country, riding fast upon camels carrying water for themselves on their camels, and traversing by night, for during the day they could not come out of shelter by reason of the heat. So far to the region on the other side of this stretch of land which we have demonstrated to be an isthmus from the Arabian gulf running into the Red Sea, from being inhabited that to northern parts are quite desert and sandy. Yet from the Arabian gulf which runs along Egypt people have started, and have circumnavigated the greater part of Arabia, hoping to reach the sea nearest to Susa and Persia, and thus have sailed so far round the Arabian coast as the amount of fresh water taken aboard their vessels have permitted, and then have returned home again. And those whom Alexander sent from Babylon in order that, sailing as far as they could on the right of the Red Sea, they might reconnoitre the country on this side, these explorers sighted certain islands lying on their course and very possibly put in at the mainland of Arabia. But the cape which Nearchus says his party sighted running out into the sea opposite Carmania no one has ever been able to round, and thus turn inwards towards the far side. I am inclined to think that had this been navigable, and had there been any passage, it would have been proved navigable, and a passage found, by the indefatigable energy of Alexander. Moreover, Hanno the Libyan started out from Carthage and passed the pillars of Heracles and sailed into the outer Ocean, with Libya on his port side, and he sailed on towards the east, five and thirty days all told. But when at last he turned southward he fell in with every sort of difficulty, want of water, burning heat, and fiery streams running into the sea. But

Cyrene, lying in the more desert parts of Africa, is grassy and fertile and well-watered, it bears all sorts of fruits and animals, right up to the region where the silphium grows; beyond this silphium belt its upper parts are bare and sandy.

Here this my history shall cease, which, as well as my other, deals with Alexander of Macedon son of Philip.

[1] The traditional accent of this name, Λυσίμαχος, used but repudiated of, by Roos, who would have preferred [illegible] or [illegible], and retained by Chantraine [illegible] is puzzled [illegible] the name itself. The origin and nature of the Macedonian language are obscured by Greek overlayings. O. Hoffmann, Die Makedonen, derives the name from [illegible] and [illegible] (beneficial) thus meaning "Benefactor." But there are difficulties in this derivation.
